Superior and Vassal—Building Restrictions—Ground-annual.—By contracts of ground-annual, the City of Glasgow Bank disposed certain building lots in Carlton Terrace, Glasgow, part of the lands of North Woodside, belonging to the bank. By the contracts, the disponees were taken bound in the second place to “erect on the said steading of ground hereby disposed a good and substantial dwelling-house of stone and lime”; “(third), the front of the house or houses to be erected . . . shall be placed upon the building line, and in all parts and portions thereof shall be built, erected, and finished in every respect in conformity with the designs and building plans” “so as not to be inferior in character and design” to the houses already built on Carlton Terrace, “the first party (the City of Glasgow Bank) being bound to take their disponees in the other steadings fronting Carlton Terrace already built upon or yet to be built upon, bound to observe similar conditions and to maintain and erect houses not inferior in character and design to the houses built as aforesaid”; “and further, declaring that the second party in building shall be bound to conform to the general feuing-plan of North Woodside; and the first party bind themselves and their successors to insert in all future conveyances to be granted by them or their fore-saids of their said lands of North Woodside, as shewn on the said feuing-plan, similar conditions, provisions, obligations, and others, as herein expressed.”

In 1895, when certain of the building lots in Carlton Terrace and also certain of the building lots on the remaining lands of North Woodside were as yet unbuilt on, the Assets Company, which had taken over the whole rights and obligations of the City of Glasgow Bank, proposed to erect tenements of dwelling-houses and shops on these unbuilt-on lots, and brought an action for declarator that the ground was free of restrictions. The Carlton Terrace proprietors maintained that only self-contained dwelling-houses could be erected on the unbuilt-on ground, whether in Carlton Terrace or in the rest of North Woodside.

Held that, as regarded the unbuilt-on lots in Carlton Terrace, the pursuers were entitled to erect tenements of dwelling-houses, provided that in doing so they observed the existing building line in front, and that the houses so to be erected were not inferior in character and design to the houses already built and forming part of said terrace; but that, as regarded the rest of the lands of North Woodside, the pursuers were entitled to erect tenements of dwelling-houses and shops.

Process—Declarator—Building Restrictions.—In an action for declarator that certain building ground within a burgh was not subject to any building restrictions, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) was of opinion that the ground was subject to certain restrictions and not to others, but he pronounced an interlocutor assailing the defenders, holding that it was incompetent to pronounce a limited decree unless the pursuers restricted their summons, which they declined to do.

Held (rev. the judgment) that it was competent to pronounce a limited decree, and that decree fell to be pronounced accordingly.

2nd Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

In June 1895 the Assets Company, Limited, singular successors of the City of Glasgow Bank, and as such proprietors and superiors of the lands of North Woodside, Glasgow, brought an action against their feuars in the said lands concluding for declarator that the pursuers were duly vest and seized in and were in right of fee of certain pieces of ground, being the unbuilt-on portions of the lands of North Woodside, and were "entitled to erect on the said subjects tenements of dwelling-houses or tenements of dwelling-houses and shops, or such other buildings as they think fit, provided that such tenements or buildings are not inferior in character and design to the houses already built upon the said subjects."

Separate defences were lodged for three sets of defenders, namely (a) Lamb & Gibson and John and James Anderson, whose case was disposed of by the Second Division on March 6, 1896 (23 R. 569); (b) the feuars in Carlton Gardens and Doune Gardens, whose case was disposed of in the Outer-House at a former stage of the action, and need not be farther referred to; and (c) the present defenders, who were disponees of subjects in Carlton Terrace.

The questions raised by the present defenders were whether, and to what extent, they were entitled to enforce building restrictions against the pursuers (a) as regarded the unbuilt-on portions of Carlton Terrace, and (b) as regarded the remaining lands of North Woodside.

The titles of the defenders were contracts of ground-annual between the City of Glasgow Bank and the several defenders or their authors.

The following were the material clauses as set forth in the contract of ground-annual relating to No. 5 Carlton Terrace between the City of Glasgow Bank and John Charles Robertson, merchant in Glasgow, dated in August and September 1872:—"(Second) The said" disponent "and his foresaids shall, so far as not already done, be bound and obliged, within one year from and after the date hereof, to erect and finish on the said steading of ground hereby disposed a good and substantial dwelling-house of stone and lime, covered with slates, and with polished ashlar fronts, and the back wall of striped ashlar, and which house shall yield a yearly rent equal to at least double the amount of the said ground-annual payable therefrom, and to maintain and uphold, and, if necessary, repair and rebuild the said house, so that it shall be in such good order and repair as will make it yield the said rent in all time coming: (Third) The front of the house or houses to be erected on the said steading hereby disposed shall be placed upon the building line, and in all parts and portions thereof shall be built, erected, and finished in every respect in conformity with the design and building plans exhibited by the said" disponent "to Alexander Stronach, the manager of the said bank, and approved of by him, and so as not to be inferior in character or design to the plans exhibited to and approved of by the said Alexander Stronach, with reference to the steadings of ground already built upon part of said lands, or to the houses already erected on said steadings, the first party and their foresaids being bound, as they hereby bind and oblige themselves and their successors, to take their disponees in the other steadings fronting Carlton Terrace, already built upon or yet to be built upon, bound to observe similar conditions and to maintain and erect houses not inferior in character and design to the houses built as aforesaid: (Fourth) No back house or back buildings or erections of any kind shall be erected on the said steading of ground other than" (Then followed a specification of the back buildings which might be erected, and a prohibition against the carrying on in the buildings of trades or operations which would be a nuisance): "(Fifth) The said" disponee "and his foresaids shall be bound in all time hereafter to contribute a rateable proportion of the expense of maintaining the said street called Wilton Terrace Road or Carlton Terrace," and also of maintaining a bridge across the River Kelvin. Then after certain further provisions regarding the bridge the disposition continued,— "And further, declaring that the second party and his foresaids shall be bound in building on the said steading of ground to adhere to the general feuing-plan of the said lands of North Woodside, and also declaring that the said first party and their foresaids shall not be entitled to communicate the benefit of access to the said proposed road or street called Carlton Terrace to the proprietors of the lands to the west and north of the lands of North Woodside, unless and until the said proprietors to the west and north create a servitude over their said lands to the west and north restricting themselves from erecting any other class of houses or buildings thereon, so far as extending along the street to be formed in prolongation of Carlton Terrace or Wilton Terrace until said road or street strikes the Kelvin at a point at or near to the Pear Tree Well, other than self-contained lodgings or villas of a class of not less value than £1500 each, in which event the right of access may be communicated to the proprietors of such lodgings or villas." Then followed provisions for the enforcement of the payment of the ground-annual, which was declared to be a real lien and burden on the subjects disposed, "and which other burdens, conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, declarations, and obligations are hereby created real liens and burdens in favour, not only of the first party and their foresaids, but also of their feuars and disponees, of the said lands upon and affecting the steading of ground above disposed, and houses and buildings erected or to be erected thereon, and the said real liens and burdens are hereby appointed to be recorded as part of these presents, and also to be recorded as part of all the future conveyances . . . and the first party hereby bind themselves and their successors to insert in all future conveyances to be granted by them or their foresaids of their said lands of North Woodside, as shewn on the said feuing-plan, similar conditions, provisions, obligations, and others as herein expressed."

The defenders averred (and the pursuers did not dispute) that the pursuers intended to erect tenements of dwelling-houses and shops on the unbuilt-on portions of Carlton Terrace, and also on the remaining unbuilt-on portions of North Woodside. The defenders maintained that only self-contained dwelling-houses were permitted, and pleaded; —(2) The pursuers and their authors having contracted with the defenders on the basis of said feuing-plan, the defenders should be assoilzied. (3) On a sound construction of the contracts of ground-annual and dispositions above mentioned, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 23d December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced an interlocutor which, besides findings regarding the other defenders (see 23 R. at p. 570), contained the following findings regarding the present defenders:—“(6) Finds as regards defenders, who are feuars or disponees of portions of the said subjects in Carlton Terrace, that the pursuers are bound by the conditions and restrictions which by the rights and titles granted to the said parties the granter thereof undertook to impose on his disponees: (7) Finds that before disposing further of the action as laid against the said last-mentioned defenders, it is necessary to ascertain if possible what the general feuing-plan is which is referred to in the said rights and titles: Therefore allows the pursuers and the last-mentioned defenders a proof with a view to the identification of the said feuing-plan, the pursuers to lead in the proof.”*

Limited, v.
Ogilvie.

The pursuers reclaimed against this interlocutor.

At the hearing on the reclaiming note the attention of the Court was not specially directed to the findings above quoted, and the Court, on 6th March 1896, while they recalled the findings of the interlocutor relating to the defenders Lamb & Gibson, quoad ultra adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary.

Thereafter the parties, by joint minute, agreed that a particular plan produced was the plan referred to in the contract of ground-annual above quoted, and a proof, subsequently allowed, shewed that this plan disclosed only superficial area and building lines, and indicated nothing as to the character of the buildings to be erected. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether the frontages of the areas shewn upon the plan were of a size suitable for tenements of houses.

On 18th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the conclusions of declarator are inconsistent with the conditions and restrictions which by the rights and titles granted to the proprietors in Carlton Terrace and Doune Terrace the granter thereof undertook to impose on his disponees in the lands of North Woodside: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of declarator in the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses,” &c.†

* In his note the Lord Ordinary, after referring to other provisions of the defenders' ground-annual, quoted the clause last above quoted, beginning “And the first party,” and continued,—“It was argued that this clause does not restrict the superior himself in building on the ground, but only binds him to impose restrictions on his feuars. I am prepared to repel that argument, and to hold that the superior is himself bound by the restrictions which he undertakes to impose on his disponees, and it may be of use to pronounce a finding to that effect. But beyond that I am unable to go. I am not in a position to construe the clause, because parties are not agreed as to the general feuing-plan to which it refers. I cannot in this question with the Carlton Terrace and Doune Terrace feuars assume its identity with the reduced feuing-plan signed with reference to Baird and Brown's [i.e., Lamb & Gibson's] feu-disposition. There is not in this case any question about the right of a feu to enforce conditions in other feu-rights, but only as to his right to enforce the obligations undertaken by the superior in his contract with himself.”

† “OPINION.— . . . Both parties appealed to the previous interlocutor. The pursuers contended that the decision against Lamb & Gibson ruled the question against the Carlton . . . Terrace proprietors also. These proprietors, on the other hand, contended that the latter part of the

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The question here arose under a contract of ground-annual,—that was to say, a disposition; that was sufficient to take the case out of the English decisions mentioned by the Lord Ordinary,¹ for they were cases of contracts upon which no conveyance had followed. Then Henderson v. Nimmo,² in which a feu-contract was construed against a superior upon the principle of bona fides, would not be repeated now. The only question was what did this contract of ground-annual mean on a sound construction of its terms. In considering this question it was necessary to distinguish between the unbuilt-on ground in Carlton Terrace and the unbuilt-on ground in the rest of North Woodside. The question as to the Carlton Terrace ground depended primarily on the clause at the end of article 3 of the contract of ground-annual, under which the Bank were taken bound to take their disponees bound “to observe similar conditions, and to maintain and erect houses not inferior in character and design to the houses built as aforesaid.” The defenders said that that was a prohibition against the erection of anything but self-contained dwelling-houses. But there was nothing judgment was conclusive in their favour. These contentions cannot both be sound, because the two decisions are unquestionably consistent, seeing that they are contained in one interlocutor.

“The first question is, What are the conditions which the pursuers by the title-deeds now under consideration bound themselves to impose on their disponees? It is sufficient to refer to the conditions in the Carlton Terrace titles which are printed in statement 3. Now, the clause is long and complicated and confused, and as ill-drawn as possible. No titles of Carlton Terrace have been produced, which is to be regretted, as the quotation on record is only partial. [The titles were subsequently produced.]

“Assuming the quotation in the statement to be sufficiently complete, it appears that the clause is divisible into two parts. By the first part it is declared (1) that the disponee shall be bound within a year from the date of the contract to erect a ‘dwelling-house’ of the character and quality described; (2) that the front of the house or houses to be erected ‘shall be placed upon the building line, and in all parts and portions thereof shall be built . . . in conformity with the design and building plans exhibited by the said Bruce Miller to Alexander Stronach, the manager of the said bank,’—which plans are, I am informed, No. 30 of process. It is not necessary to quote the rest of the clause about these buildings. But it proceeds ‘The first party (i.e. the Bank) and their foresaids being bound, as they hereby bind and oblige themselves and their successors, to take their disponees on the other steadings fronting Carlton Terrace already built upon, or yet to be built upon, bound to observe similar conditions and to maintain and erect houses not inferior in character and design to the houses built as aforesaid.’ This is a clause of restriction in reference only to Carlton Terrace, not to the rest of North Woodside. This clause may perhaps not mean that the clauses in the new dispositions should be absolutely identical with those quoted; but I think that, fairly construed, it does mean that they shall be substantially the same, and that they shall at least stipulate that dwelling-houses shall be erected on the remaining stances, and that a building line shall be preserved.

in article 3 to prohibit either tenements of houses or shops. The word "self-contained" was not used, whereas it was used in the subsequent clause relating to the prolongation of Carlton Terrace, from which the fair inference was that when self-contained houses were intended they were so described. Then article 3 in terms contemplated that more than one house might be erected on each stead- ing, for "houses," in the plural, were referred to. Article 2, no doubt, contemplated only one house, but the purpose of article 2 was to impose an obligation on the disponee in order to secure the ground-annual, and if he fulfilled that obligation he was at liberty to erect as many more houses as was possible either on the same level or on the top of one another, which last were tenements of houses. The defenders admitted that there was no effectual prohibition against the use of the buildings as shops, but it was said that they must not be constructed as shops. The deed, however, did not say so. All it said was that the buildings must not be inferior in character and design to those already existing. But shops were not necessarily "inferior" to dwelling-houses, nor were tenements of houses pursuers if it be intelligible at all. It was their bargain,—they chose to make it—that they should insert such conditions in the dispositions of the remaining stances in Carlton Terrace. I am unable to see why they should not be held to their bargain. The present defenders, who are owners of houses in Carlton Terrace, no doubt relied on it when they made their purchases. There might be a question whether one disponee could enforce the conditions against another. But where is the question whether a disponee could enforce them against the disponent? I think the clause must be held obligatory if it be intelligible. Now, it has been decided that, if the disponent obliged himself to impose these conditions on the disponees, he imposed them on himself.

"Pausing at this point, the question is whether the declaratory conclusions are consistent with these conditions. I cannot see that they are. The declarator asked is extremely wide. It is really a conclusion that the pursuers are entitled to erect whatever buildings they please, provided they are not inferior in character and design to the houses already built on the subjects. Such a declarator would enable them to disregard the building line of Carlton Terrace, and it would enable them to build shops where dwelling-houses are stipulated for. I cannot but think that it would be against the good faith of the contract with the proprietors of the houses in Carlton Terrace to fill up the vacant stances with tenements and shops. It is true that the declarator would be quite consistent with the clause so far as I have considered it, if Carlton Terrace were excepted. But I have not been asked to pronounce a declarator excepting Carlton Terrace. The decision against Lamb & Gibson and John and James Anderson does not seem to affect this question, because of the marked difference between the provisions of the dispositions.

"The clause proceeds to mention other conditions. It contains important restrictions as to back building on the steadings, which I take to be material to the general plan, and certain other obligations, which I need not mention specially, because they seem reconcilable with the declaratory conclusions; and there is the declaration 'that the second party and his foresaids shall be bound in building on the said steadings of ground to adhere to the general feuing-plan of North Woodside,' and there follows the obligation to insert in all future conveyances of the lands of North Woodside, as shewn on the feuing-plan, similar conditions, &c.

"Now, as the obligation on the disponee in this contract measures the obligation to be imposed on other disponees, it seems to follow that the pursuers are here bound to impose on their future disponees of any part of necessarily "inferior" to self-contained houses. Nearly every street in the New Town of Edinburgh—which was conspicuous for its regularity—had tenements at the corners at all events. In short, the clause did not secure the uniformity, but at most the general character and value of the buildings; a very much superior self-contained dwelling-house would destroy the uniformity, but even on the defenders' construction it would not violate the deed. As regarded the remaining lands of North Woodside, they were under no restriction at all. No doubt, in the clause towards the end of the deed the Bank took themselves bound to insert similar conditions, &c., in all future conveyances of North Woodside, but then as this clause applied to the whole of North Woodside, including Carlton Terrace, it could not be supposed to refer to conditions, &c., regarding the main buildings, for that construction would render the concluding portion of article 3 unnecessary. The later clause, therefore, referred to the stipulations which followed article 3, i.e., the stipulations regarding the back buildings, the opening up of roads, bridges, &c., and to these only, which consequently

North Woodside an obligation to adhere to the general feuing-plan, and, by force of the interlocutor already pronounced, this infers that the pursuers are themselves bound to observe the general feuing-plan.

"But then it is said that it has already been decided in the question with Lamb & Gibson that an obligation to observe a feuing-plan was not binding on the pursuers, and it is argued that it follows that, in this question with the Terrace proprietors, an obligation to observe the general feuing-plan must be held equally ineffectual. I feel that this argument is embarrassing, but it seems to be an argument from one finding in an interlocutor against another, and I think I cannot but hold that seeing that the pursuers are bound to impose this obligation on their disponees, they are bound by it themselves. I think I would contradict the finding in the previous interlocutor which relates to the present proprietors if I did not hold that.

"It is to be observed, however, that the general feuing-plan No. 10 is materially different from the feuing-plan referred to in Lamb & Gibson's disposition. It shews not only the lines of the terraces and the roads and ornamental ground, but also the various stances, and it was to explain the various lines shewn on the plan that the evidence was led.

"I do not clearly see why, when a party binds himself to abide by a general feuing-plan, he should not in a question with the person with whom he contracts—so long as the plan has not been infringed on—be held to his bargain; and looking to the differences between the contract and the plan in this part of the case, and in that relating to Lamb & Gibson, I do not think I am bound to hold,—and indeed I do not think I can hold,—that the pursuers are not bound by the general feuing-plan.

"The question remains, however, what is it that the general feuing-plan indicates, and what is the obligation which an adherence to it involves? This is the subject-matter of the proof. On this point, however, I think there is little to be said. I think the proof is of no great value, and weighing the evidence on both sides, I am satisfied that the plan does not indicate with sufficient distinctness, for the imposition of a building restriction, that nothing but dwelling-houses were to be permitted on the line of Carlton Terrace and Gardens and Doune Terrace and Gardens. In particular, I am not satisfied that an obligation to adhere to the plan involves a prohibition against tenements of dwelling-houses or tenements of dwelling-houses with shops; and if the pursuers had asked only for a declarator that the titles did not prevent them from building tenements of dwelling-houses and tenements of dwelling-houses and shops on their lands, were the only stipulations binding on the pursuers, except as regarded the unbuilt-on part of Carlton Terrace. The pursuers did not dispute that the decree might be qualified so as to preserve to the defenders such rights as they might possess under these later clauses; a formal restriction of the summons was not necessary; the Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment was not well founded.

Argued for the defenders;—The Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment was well founded. This was not a petitory action, but an action relating to title; and the pursuers were bound to set forth in their summons what they wanted, and were not entitled simply to table the deed and leave the Court to discover what it meant. Then on the merits, the defenders put their case upon contract, and not upon the doctrine of real burden. The pursuers or their authors, the City of Glasgow Bank, whose obligations they were bound to fulfil, had contracted to do certain things, and the question was what, upon a fair reading of the contract had they contracted to do? Now, what the defenders had contracted to do was to build a good and substantial dwelling-house, i.e., a self-contained house, which was a house for the occupation of a single family, and what the pursuers had contracted to do was to build, or to see to the building of, a similar dwelling-house on each of the remaining steadings. It was admitted that there was no prohibition against the use of the dwelling-house by more than one family, or as shops; but while that was so, the buildings to be erected must in outward appearance be like those already erected,—that was to say, self-contained dwelling-houses. The case for restriction might be stronger as regarded the remainder of Carlton Terrace than as regarded the other unbuilt-on ground. The pursuers' only argument, however, against taking the general clause of restriction towards the end of the deed as applying to the main buildings as well as to the other restrictions was, that this construction involved a surplusage of restriction as regarded

I do not say that that might not have been granted. Such a declarator would leave untouched all the conditions of the deed. It would only involve an interpretation of the plan. But that is not the nature of the pursuers' demand in this action. They ask a declarator which would in truth free them from the conditions of the contract altogether, and enable them to disregard the building line shewn on the plan, and also all the restrictions and conditions in reference to the back buildings.

"The pursuers declined to restrict their conclusions; but it was suggested that I might give decree under such qualifications as I considered imposed by the contract. But I do not think I can be called on to do that.

"My view is that, while the pursuers may not be restricted from building tenements of dwelling-houses, or of dwelling-houses with shops, except on Carlton Terrace, as to which there is, in my opinion, such a restriction, they are bound to adhere to the building-lines shewn on the plans, and to conform to the conditions as to back buildings. But I have not been asked to embody these opinions in a decret of declarator. The result is, in my opinion, inevitable, that the present defenders are entitled to absolvitor. . . .

"I have dealt with this case as entirely special, and I do not think it much affected by any of the cases quoted. On the part of the pursuers, reference was made to Henderson v. Nimmo, 20th May 1840, 2 D. 869; Baskcomb v. Beckwith, 1869, 8 Eq. 100; Piggott v. Stratton, 1860, 29 L. J. Ch. 1; Peacock v. Penson, March 1848, 11 Beav. 355; Millar v. The Endowment Committee, 4th March 1896, 23 R. 557; and by the defenders to Middleton v. Leslie, 23d May 1894, 21 R. 781."

No. 73. Carlton Terrace. This was a dangerous rule of construction to apply to an obviously inartistically framed deed. The anxious clauses guarding against the undue admission of strangers to the benefits of the North Woodside streets, &c., plainly shewed the intention of the parties to these deeds to be that the estate of North Woodside should be confined to streets of high class residences, which a miscellaneous collection of shops, tenements, and self-contained houses would not be.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers in this case do not now insist on declarator in the full terms of the conclusions of the summons, but are willing, if they can obtain a judgment on the main point at issue, which regards the character of the buildings they are entitled to erect, that the rights of the defenders as regards the line of buildings, erections on back ground, &c., should be reserved. But they adhere to their demand for a declarator of their right to erect tenements of houses and shops on the lands in question, and this is resisted by the defenders, who maintain that only self-contained dwellings may be erected.

On the question whether houses of the tenement class may be erected, if similar in style and design to those already on the ground, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the conditions to prevent the pursuers from having their right to do so declared, and that if in the words of the deed “good and substantial dwelling-houses of stone and lime, and covered” with slates are erected, that would be within the feuars’ rights, although the buildings were so arranged internally that the different flats could be inhabited as separate houses.

Upon the question whether shops may be erected as part of the buildings, I have, as regards Carlton Terrace, had very considerable difficulty and doubt, but I have come finally to the conclusion that the terms of the feu-contract are such as not to warrant the erection of buildings other than dwelling-houses, and that any plans which would present an external appearance inconsistent with the expression “dwelling-house” would not be in conformity with them.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am not prepared to dispose of this case in the manner in which the Lord Ordinary has disposed of it. His Lordship has assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons altogether, because he is of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to a decree to the full extent concluded for, and because the pursuers declined to restrict their conclusions. It is clear, from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, that he thought the pursuers were entitled to a decree of declarator somewhat within the terms of the conclusions, but because they have asked more than they were entitled to, and would not ask less, he has refused them everything. I say I am not prepared to deal with the case in this way, but, on the contrary, am prepared to give the pursuers such a declarator within the limits of their conclusions as they may have established their right to have, although their demand is for something more. Apart from this difference as to the mode in which the case should be dealt with, I concur generally in the views of the Lord Ordinary (as expressed in his opinion) as to the extent of the pursuers’ rights. The main contention on the part of the defenders was that the pursuers were restrained, under their titles, from building anything upon the ground in question except self-contained dwelling-houses. This argument was maintained on a construction of the clauses contained in the ground-annual between the City of Glasgow Bank (the pursuers' authors) and John Charles Robertson, the defenders' author, dated in August and September 1872. The import of these clauses may be shortly stated thus :—(1) Mr Robertson bound himself, within a year, to erect "a good and substantial dwelling-house," which would yield a rent equal to double the ground-annual ; (2) the front "of the house or houses" so to be erected was to be on the building line, and in every respect erected and finished in conformity with the design and building-plans specially designated, and so as not to be inferior in character or design to houses already erected in Carlton Terrace ; and (3) the first party—that is, the pursuers' authors—obliged themselves and their successors to take their disponees in the other steadings fronting Carlton Terrace bound "to observe similar conditions, and to maintain and erect houses not inferior in character and design to the houses built as aforesaid."

No. 73.

Assets Co.,
Limited, v.
Ogilvie.

From a consideration of these clauses, it appears that the only obligation imposed on the disponers was to take their disponees bound to observe similar conditions to those imposed on Mr Robertson, and to erect and maintain houses not inferior in character and design to those already built in Carlton Terrace. I assume with the Lord Ordinary that the disponers were themselves bound to observe similar conditions to those they had undertaken to impose on their disponees. Beyond this, it is not pretended that under the clauses I have referred to there is any obligation on the disponers (now represented by the pursuers) which restrains them from the freest use of their property. The extent of their restriction therefore is to be found in the restriction placed on Mr Robertson—the restrictions on Mr Robertson and the pursuers are co-extensive. Now, Mr Robertson was bound in the first place to erect a "good and substantial dwelling-house." The defenders say that this means a single self-contained dwelling-house, which they define to be a house fitted for the occupation of one family only, and occupied by one family. The first answer to that is, that the defenders read into the deed a qualification which is not there. The descriptive phrase "self-contained" was well known and in common use at the date when the ground-annual was executed, and presumably would have been used had it been intended to put on Mr Robertson the restriction which it implies. But in the next place, the opening words of the second clause (as quoted by me above) evidently contemplate that Mr Robertson would or might build more than one house upon the ground disposed to him. But, further, suppose that Mr Robertson had erected a semi-detached villa there, good and substantial in itself, and yielding a rental of at least the double of the ground-annual, could it have been reasonably maintained that he had gone beyond his right, or failed to fulfil his obligation? I think not. And yet such a building would not have been within the defenders' definition of a self-contained dwelling-house, for it would have been one fitted for the accommodation of, and would have been occupied by, two families. The defenders' main contention, therefore, seems to me to be unsound. This leads directly to the question whether there is any restriction on the pursuers disentitling them to build tenements of houses, and I am of opinion that there is not. If it cannot be affirmed that the pursuers by the terms of their titles are restrained from building any but self-contained dwelling-houses, there is no restraint upon them building any other kind of dwelling-house they please. To revert to the illustration I have already given, if the pursuers are at liberty (as Mr Robertson was in my opinion) to build a house for the accommodation of two families, they are equally entitled to build a house to accommodate four or six families. And if they are at liberty to build two houses (as in a semi-detached villa) alongside of each other, why may they not build two or three houses, one on the top of the other, which is just a tenement of dwelling-houses. Such tenements, however, must be on the existing building line of Carlton Terrace, and not be inferior in character and design to the houses already built there. These limitations I understand the pursuers are willing to observe.

There remains the question whether the pursuers are entitled to build in Carlton Terrace a tenement of houses, the lower or ground floor of which should be occupied as shops. On this question there is more room for doubt. Shops and dwelling-houses are certainly not the same thing. But the same premises, occupied by one tenant, may be both house and shop—the shop in front, the dwelling-rooms behind. The defenders admit that if the pursuers build a tenement of dwelling-houses, their tenants may, without objection, exhibit in their windows, either on the ground floor or above, articles of merchandise for sale. If it is only built as a dwelling-house it may be used as a shop. A shoemaker or tailor may carry on his calling at the front window of his house, and have his signboard above it without objection. But what is that after all but a shop? I fail to see any interest which the defenders can qualify to maintain such a restriction, if such a restriction exists, it being one so easily evaded. But in truth I think the objection resolves itself into one as to the use to which the building can be put; and I think there is no restriction imposed on the use by the clauses I have referred to. There is in another part of the deed an express restriction as to the erection of factories, &c., or to the carrying on of certain trades, but this restriction the pursuers do not wish to violate. On the contrary, they expressly stated that such restriction is to be observed, and they are willing to take their declarator subject to it. The Lord Ordinary seems to be of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to build tenements of houses with shops, and I am rather inclined to agree with him. But I do not press that view, as I understand your Lordships are of a different opinion.

Apart, however, from Carlton Terrace, I think the pursuers are not prohibited from erecting on their ground tenements of houses and shops by anything in their titles which the present defenders have any interest or title to plead.

LORD MONCRIEFF.—In deciding on the respective contentions of the parties I think that a distinction may be made between the steading fronting Carlton Terrace and the remaining ground belonging to the pursuers not yet built upon.

As regards the steadings fronting Carlton Terrace, I agree with your Lordships that there is not sufficient warrant in the feu-contract to restrict the pursuers to erecting self-contained dwelling-houses.

I think they are entitled to erect tenements of dwelling-houses not inferior in character and design to the houses already built. But I do not think they are entitled to build shops. Reading the second, third, and fourth heads of the contract, I think it is stipulated with sufficient distinctness to be binding upon the pursuers that the houses to be erected by them or their disponees on steadings fronting Carlton Terrace shall not only be placed on the same building line as those already erected, and be not inferior in character and design to them, but shall, externally at least, be dwelling-houses; the object of the stipulation being to preserve the residential appearance of the locality.

It may be that when tenements of houses are erected they may be used as shops. The contract does not contain any general prohibition against such a use, and the provisions of the fourth head of the contract are by no means inconsistent with it. But as regards Carlton Terrace I do not think that the pursuers are entitled to a decree which would enable them wholly to disregard what I take to be the contract of parties as to the external appearance of the buildings.

As regards the pursuers' ground unbuilt on, other than Carlton Terrace, I should have been content to grant decree of declarator in the same terms as that applicable to Carlton Terrace. But possibly a distinction may be drawn between the two cases; and as I understand that your Lordships are prepared to give the pursuers a wider decree as regards the remaining subjects, I do not press my doubts as to them.

The result is that I agree in the judgment which is proposed, which is very nearly in accordance with the Lord Ordinary's views.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find and declare (1) that as regards that part of the subjects described in the conclusion of the summons, of which the pursuers are proprietors, fronting Carlton Terrace, the pursuers are entitled to erect thereon tenements of dwelling-houses, provided that in doing so they observe the existing building line in front, and that the houses so to be erected are not inferior in character and design to the houses already built, and forming part of said Terrace; and (2) that as regards the other parts of said subjects, the pursuers are entitled to erect thereon tenements of dwelling-houses and shops: Reserving to the defenders any right which they may have to enforce any other conditions, provisions, and obligations imposed on the pursuers or their authors by the titles granted by them, or either of them, in favour of the defenders or their authors: Quoad ultra dismiss the action."

Her executor presented a petition under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, stating that the will and codicil were subscribed and witnessed by the persons whom he mentioned in the petition, and craving a proof, and thereafter to have it declared that the deeds were subscribed by the grantor and by the persons by whom the deeds bore to be attested. The Court allowed a proof by commission, and thereafter found and declared as craved.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a petition presented by Robert Nisbet, executor of the deceased Miss Agnes Nisbet, Glasgow, under section 39 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.*

The petition stated that Miss Nisbet died on 6th January 1896, leaving testamentary writings consisting, inter alia, of a will and codicil, both dated 26th November 1892; that each of these deeds was subscribed by Miss Nisbet, and bore to be attested by "William Barton" and "Dorothea S. Kerr"; and that the designations of these witnesses were not contained in the will and codicil, and were not appended to their signatures; that the signatures were the genuine signatures of the said Agnes Nisbet and of the two witnesses who were designed; that the will was partly printed and partly written, the written part being in the handwriting of Mr William Meikle, actuary to the Glasgow Savings Bank, with the exception of the date in the testing-clause, which was written by David Smith, doctor of medicine, 48 Dundas Street, Glasgow, and that the codicil was also written by Mr Meikle, with the exception of the place and date, which were also written by Dr Smith.

The prayer was in these terms:—"To allow the petitioner a proof of the averments contained in this petition, and thereafter to declare that the will and codicil above mentioned were subscribed by the said Agnes Nisbet, the grantor or maker thereof, and by the said William Barton and the said Dorothea Stewart or Kerr, the witnesses, by whom the said will and codicil bear to be attested."

On 16th December 1896 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allow the petitioner a proof of the averments contained in the petition, that the will and codicil mentioned and founded on therein were written, subscribed, and witnessed by the persons, and as mentioned in the petition, and granted diligence and commission to examine witnesses and havers."

The proof reported by the Commissioner (Professor Moir) established, in the opinion of the Court, that the will and codicil had been signed by Miss Nisbet and the witnesses as averred in the petition.

* The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 39, enacted,—"No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the grantor or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the grantor or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same, and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such grantor or maker and witnesses."

The petitioner cited the case of Addison, &c., Feb. 23, 1875, 2 R. No. 74. 457, and argued that in terms of the statute the petition fell to be granted.—[LORD M'LAREN having called the attention of the petitioner's counsel to the fact that the will was partly printed and partly written, LORD KINNEAR referred to section 149 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 *].—The petitioner maintained that it made no difference that the will was partly printed and partly written.

Nisbet.

LORD ADAM.—I think this petition should be granted. In my opinion the petitioner has discharged the burden placed upon him by the latter clause of the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and has proved that the deed was subscribed by the granter and witnesses by whom it bears to be subscribed. That is all the statute requires of him.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with Lord Adam. In calling attention to the fact that the deed was partly written and partly printed, I did not intend to suggest any doubt that such a deed was valid if authenticated by two instrumentary witnesses; but of course it is always right to look at the statutory enactments when such a difficulty occurs.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. We are not at present called upon to express any opinion as to the legal effect of the instrument when it has been so far set up as the declaration which Mr Aitken asks for will set it up. At the same time, as the question has been mooted, I do not think it out of place to say that, so far as I see, there probably would have been a question under the Titles to Lands Acts of 1858 and 1868 which the petitioner desires to remove by proceeding under the Act of 1874. Whether it has been effectually obviated, we cannot determine in this process.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition, together with the report by Professor Moir, and the will and codicils of Miss Agnes Nisbet produced by the Depute-Clerk Registrar, and heard counsel for the petitioner, find and declare that the said will and codicil, dated 26th November 1892, of Miss Agnes Nisbet, were subscribed by her as granter or maker thereof, and by William Barton and Dorothea Stewart or Kerr, the witnesses by whom the said will and codicil bear to be attested, and decern; and find the petitioner entitled to the expenses of the present proceedings out of the funds of the trust-estate of the said Agnes Nisbet."

Contract—Sale—Construction—Clause of Reference.—On 27th May 1895 A, a member of the Beetroot Sugar Association, by contract with B, who was not a member, sold to him sugar at 10s. 9d. per cwt., to be delivered in October-December 1895. The contract incorporated the rules of the association as fully as if these had been expressly inserted therein, and further provided that the Council of the London Association was the referee of all disputes.

Rule 32 provided,—“If any member liable on the face of unmatured contracts shall suspend payment . . . the Council of the United Kingdom Association to which he belongs shall, as soon as possible after the suspension . . . meet, fix, and publish official quotations and due dates for all periods of delivery that may be in question; the prices to be according to the average buying and selling market value of the day on which the member defaulted or suspended payment. The contracts in question shall then be closed upon the terms so fixed.”

A suspended payment in June 1895, and the Council of the London Association fixed the market price of sugar at 10s. 3d., at which the contract fell to be closed, the purchaser, if the rule applied, thus becoming liable for the difference between that and the contract price. B refused to pay the difference, alleging that rule 32 only applied to contracts between members. A, after intimation to B, referred the dispute to the London Council, who decided that the rule applied, and ordained B to pay the sum so fixed.

In an action by A for implement of the award, held that under the contract the Council was constituted referee of all disputes, and that their decision was final.

Opinions that the decision of the Council was sound, and that rule 32, having been imported into the contract, applied to B, although he was not a member of the association.

Stewart, Brown, & Company suspended payment on 15th June 1895, and according to rule No. 32 the contract fell to be closed at a price to be fixed by the Council of the London Association. The price was fixed at 10s. 3d. per cwt., and intimated to Grime, and on applying this price to the contract there appeared a balance of £73, 6s. due by him to Stewart, Brown, & Company. v. Grime.

Stewart, Brown, & Company, with due notice to Grime, submitted the matter to the Council of the London Association for arbitration, and on 16th June 1896 the Council issued an award ordaining Grime to pay the sum as the difference in price between his contract and that fixed by the Council.

Grime refused to recognise the award as applicable to him, and Stewart, Brown, & Company raised this action against him for £73, 6s. in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow.

Such certificates may be used for the closing of contracts with non-members, who may have suspended payment, or may have been declared defaulters. . . . 35. Any disputes that may arise out of or in relation to any contract shall be referred either to such member of the Association at the port of destination as both parties may agree on; or else to two members thereof, one to be chosen by each party; or else to the Council. . . . 41. A registration fee of ten shillings shall be paid upon each application to the secretary for arbitration, and shall follow the fees in the award. * "NOTE.— . . . The referees have already decided that the clause in question is applicable to this particular contract, and, in my opinion, it was quite within their power to do so.

"But even were it to be held that this is a matter which requires to be decided by the Court, I must say that I see no good reason for holding that the rule is limited to the parties inter se, and has no reference to this contract. The rules are, no doubt, primarily applicable to members of the association, and intended to regulate their rights and liabilities inter se, but it appears to me that a special provision in a contract that it includes the rules and regulations to the same effect as if they were incorporated therein has the effect (unless there is something special in the rules to prevent it) of putting the parties in the same position as members, in so far as regards that particular contract, by giving them the same rights and imposing on them the same liabilities. Under the 32d rule, if the parties to the contract are members, and one of them is declared a defaulter or suspends payment, the contract is closed on certain fixed terms. Why should not the same provision apply to a contract entered into between a member and an outsider, which is specially declared to be subject to the same rules? I must confess my inability to understand why this particular

v. Grime.

The defender appealed, and argued ;—There was no valid reference. Arbitration was limited to contracts falling under the rules, and it was enough for him to shew that this contract was not under the rules, and had been referred without his consent.¹ Rule 32 only applied to members. He was probably bound by rules relating to matters incidental to sale, e.g., sampling and delivery, but rule 32 was not concerned with such matters. Rule 41 recognised the difference between members and non-members, and shewed that the latter were only subject to arbitration on their own application. He had never consented to arbitration, and he could not be bound by the award.² Rule 32 might have applied to him had he been insolvent, but that had not happened.

Argued for the pursuers ;—The contract referred all disputes. The dispute as to the application of rule 32 had been referred and decided. That was enough, but even on the merits it was clear that rule 32 was binding on the defender, as the rules had been incorporated in the contract.

rule should not apply to the defender as much as the other rules which he admits are binding on him.

“It appears to be settled that the rules of an association imported into a contract, as in this case, are not held binding on an outsider unless they are reasonable and in conformity with the law (Leake's Law of Contracts, p. 436, and the cases therein cited). Now, the defender maintains that this is not the case here. He even goes the length of saying that the rule in question is contra bonos mores. It must be conceded that the rule is somewhat anomalous, and runs counter to the rules by which contracts are regulated. According to the ordinary law, the bankruptcy of one of the parties entirely terminates the contract, and may give rise to a claim of damages at the instance of the other party. By the rule in question the contract is terminated, but with the result, that in place of being liable in damages for failure to fulfil it, the bankrupt may get a profit solely in consequence of his being a defaulter. This the defender maintains is nothing else than a premium on insolvency. But the rule is not illegal; although it alters the incidence it does not change the character of the contract, and it appears to me that the mere fact of its being adopted as a rule of this association is in itself sufficient to prevent the Court refusing to give effect to it as unreasonable. The association does not consist of brokers. It includes generally buyers and sellers of sugar who choose to become members. Now if these parties—many of them are persons of great experience in this trade—have adopted and acted on this rule as beneficial inter se, how can I say that it is unreasonable when applied to a person who buys sugar but is not a member of the association. As was said by Chief Justice Cockburn in the case of Grinsell against Bernston, L. R., 4 C. P. C. 48, ‘a usage founded on the general convenience of all parties cannot be said to be unreasonable.’

“The defender founded very strongly on the case of Duncan v. Hill, L. R., 8 Ex. 242. . . . Had the pursuers acted as brokers on behalf of the defender in the transaction in question, this decision would have been very much in point, but both parties having expressly acted as principals, the ratio decidendi does not apply. Besides, if the clause in question applies to this contract, the defender agreed to pay the pursuers any difference that might arise from the closing of the accounts even by the pursuers' defeasance. . . .”

Beetroot Sugar Association, entered into a contract with the defender, who is not a member of that Association. This contract provided that the rules, regulations, and bye-laws of the Association should be incorporated in the contract as if the same had been expressly inserted therein, and that the Council of the Association was to be the referee of all disputes. The defender therefore entered into this contract on the footing that the rules of the Association applied to the contract; he accepted the rules as applying to him as if he had been a member of the Association. It is quite plain on the face of the rules that they contemplated that persons who were non-members of the Association might enter into a contract under which they were to be bound by and have the benefits of the rules.

It is contended that the rules, although incorporated in the contract, only apply to the defender where there is an express reference to non-members in the rules themselves. I cannot accept that argument. If such a qualification was intended it could easily have been expressed in the contract. But what the contract does is to import the whole rules as binding on both parties.

Besides, it is expressly provided that the Council of the Association is to be the referee in all disputes. The matter has been considered and decided by them; I see no ground for interfering with their judgment.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The introductory words of contract are "subject always to the printed rules, regulations, and bye-laws" of the Association, and the contract ends with a provision that these rules are incorporated into it. There is no dispute as to the identity of these rules or bye-laws. The contract further provides that the Council of the Association is to be the referee in all disputes. A dispute arose between the parties to the contract as to the effect of this reference to the rules. What was the consequence of that? The dispute was referred to the Council as referee. The Council decided that the rules applied. I agree that their decision is final. I also agree that the view which the Council took is right. The case is as clear as if this was a contract between dealers in stocks made subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange. In such a case the rules of the Stock Exchange would be imported into the contract, and if the contract further provided that all disputes under it were to be referred to A B, it is plain that if any difference arose under the contract, A B would be the proper person to decide it.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is right.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. It is probably sufficient for the decision of the case that in terms of the contract the Council of the Association is made the referee of all disputes, and that the Council has already decided on the matter under discussion.

On the merits I am of opinion that the decision of the Council was sound. I think the defender clearly brought himself under the rules of the Beetroot Association. It is admitted that if the contract had been between members of the Association, rule 32 would undoubtedly have applied. It is provided that the rules of the Association may be applied to contracts between members and non-members, and this rule having been imported

No. 75. into the contract between the parties, it applies just as if they both had been members of the Association.

Assignment—Title to sue—Statute—Construction—"Assets"—Claims of damages—City of Glasgow Bank Liquidation Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. clii.).—In 1882 the Assets Company, Limited, under a private Act of Parliament, took over the outstanding assets of the City of Glasgow Bank, which had gone into liquidation in 1878. The Act proceeded on the narrative, inter alia, that "a large amount of the outstanding assets of the bank, though believed to be of increasing value, cannot at present be advantageously realised," and defined "assets" to mean "all lands and heritages, debts, bonds, mortgages, securities, moneys, effects, choses in action, claims and demands whatsoever, including claims for unpaid calls, and in general all property, real or personal, heritable or moveable, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, belonging to or vested in the bank or the liquidators, or which the bank has power to acquire." The Act incorporated an agreement between the Assets Company and the liquidators of the bank, and appended to the agreement, and referred to therein, was a state of affairs of the bank, setting forth its assets and its liabilities as at 22d October 1881. In the specification of assets in this state of affairs, claims against contributories of the bank who had fraudulently settled with the liquidators were not expressly mentioned.

In 1896 the Assets Company brought an action against the trustees of a contributory who had, in 1879, been discharged of his liabilities to the bank upon a compromise with the liquidators, concluding for a reduction of the discharge, or for damages, on the ground that the contributory in transacting with the liquidators had fraudulently understated the amount of his property.

The defenders pleaded no title to sue, maintaining that upon a sound construction of the Act read in connection with the agreement and relative state of affairs, such claims had not been assigned to the company.

The Court repelled the plea of no title to sue.

Fraud—Reduction—Restitutio in integrum—Relevancy—General averments of fraud—Mora—Diligence for recovery of documents.—The City of Glasgow Bank went into liquidation in 1878, and in 1879 A, one of the contributories, settled with the liquidators, and was discharged of his liabilities to the bank, which amounted to £27,000, on payment of £11,250, that being the value of A's property as disclosed in a state submitted by him to the liquidators.

In 1896 the Assets Company, which had in 1882 taken over the assets of the bank, brought an action against A's testamentary trustees concluding for reduction of the discharge, or, alternatively, for damages. The pursuers averred that A had fraudulently concealed from the liquidators items belonging to him which the pursuers specifically mentioned and alleged to be of the value of £3282, and "in addition to the assets above specified, the said" A "concealed other assets belonging to him and money in his possession to the extent of at least £40,000." They further averred that, according to a declaration made by A before he arranged with the liquida-tors, he was a man advanced in years, incapable of work, and with no expectations; and yet that he died leaving £43,000. No. 76.

The defenders—who admitted that A had died leaving the amount averred, and that certain of the specific items of property founded on by the pursuers stood in his name at the time of his discharge, and were not mentioned in his state of affairs—pleaded;—(1) that the reductive conclusion was incompetent, in respect that restitutio in integrum was impossible; (2) that the averments—at least the general averment—of fraudulent concealment were irrelevant for want of specification; and (3) mora. Appeal—Leave to appeal.—Leave to appeal against an interlocutor repelling a plea of no title to sue, and quoad ultra allowing a proof before answer, refused.

By the City of Glasgow (Liquidation) Act, 1882, and relative discharge by the liquidators of the bank, recorded 30th December 1882, the assets of the bank, as defined in the Act, were vested in the Assets Company, Limited, at that date.* 2^d DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

* The City of Glasgow (Liquidation) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. clii.) proceeded on the preamble, inter alia, that “whereas a large amount of the outstanding assets of the bank though believed to be of increasing value, cannot at present be advantageously realised, and the committee of contributories, in order to enable the liquidation of the bank to be finally closed, so as to prevent accumulation of interest on the amount of claims unpaid, and the possibility of any further call on the remaining partners of the bank, and in order to preserve these assets for more advantageous realisation than could be effected in the ordinary course of liquidation, proposed to form and register under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, a company to be called ‘the Assets Company, Limited’ (hereinafter referred to as the ‘company’), with a memorandum of association in the form set forth in the first schedule to this Act, with relative articles of association, to take over the assets subject to the conditions contained in the agreement set forth in the second schedule to this Act . . . And whereas many of the contributories and of the creditors of the bank are under legal disability to invest in or contribute to the shares of the company, or to accept or take debentures of the company, and it is desirable that power should be given to persons under such legal disability to acquire and hold the shares or the debentures of the company, and so not only to assist in expediting the conclusion of the liquidation, but to share in such benefit as may be derived from the ultimate realisation of the assets. . . .”

The Act enacted, inter alia, as follows:—Sec. 1. “In this Act . . . ‘the assets’ shall mean all lands and heritages, debts, bonds, mortgages, securities, moneys, effects, choses in action, claims and demands whatsoever, including claims for unpaid calls, and in general all property, real or personal, heritable or moveable, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, belonging to or vested in the bank or the liquidators, or which the bank has power to acquire, or which are or is held in trust for or to be realised solely for account of the bank at the date of the vesting hereinafter mentioned, but shall not comprise the liability of any contributory to calls except such as have been made by the liquidators before the passing of this Act.”

Sec. 2 confirmed the agreement referred to in the preamble, and set forth in the second schedule.

This agreement, on the narrative, inter alia, that “whereas, from the Trustees.

In May 1895 the Assets Company brought an action against the trustees of the late William Shirres, manufacturer in Aberdeen, who died on 1st January 1895, concluding for reduction of (1) an interlocutor of the First Division, dated 10th June 1879, sanctioning an arrangement for compromise between the liquidators of the bank and Mr Shirres; and (2) an agreement and discharge between him and the liquidators, dated 27th June and 1st July 1879; further concluding for an accounting by the defenders as to their intromission with his estates, and failing an accounting for payment to the pursuers of £28,498, 10s. 11d. as the balance of their intromission; and further concluding alternatively for payment of £28,498, 10s. 11d. as damages.

The pursuers averred (cond. 1) that Mr Shirres was a holder of £1200 of the capital stock of the City of Glasgow Bank when it report (and relative appendices) for the year ending 22d October 1881, being the third year of the liquidation, issued by the liquidators to the contributories, it appears that the total assets of the bank as at that date amounted to £1,508,698, 12s. 1d., and the total liabilities to £1,338,116, 6s. 9d., as is more particularly shewn by the state of affairs appended to said report, a copy of which state is also appended hereto: And whereas the said liabilities are almost entirely long past due, and the amount thereof is increasing by reason of interest accruing upon some of them, and it is the duty of the liquidators to take measures for paying the same; but they are satisfied that if they were at present to force the realisation of some of the assets, such enforced realisation would not produce, by a considerable sum, the amount at which the said assets are entered in said state of affairs,"—provided, inter alia, as follows:—"First, In the event of the said company being formed and carried out, the second parties [the persons acting for the company] hereby undertake that it shall pay to the first parties [liquidators], on or before the 1st day of October 1882—first, a sum sufficient to enable them to pay and discharge the whole liabilities of the bank which shall previous to said date have been claimed for and admitted in the liquidation. . . . Second, In respect of said payments the first parties shall, if and when required, transfer, dispoise, convey, and make over to the said company, or to their nominees or assignees, the whole assets and property, of whatever nature and wheresoever situated, including all rights, claims, and privileges of every description to which the said City of Glasgow Bank, or anyone on their behalf, shall then have right; and the company shall thereafter be entitled to the income or annual produce which may be received or which may accrue upon the said assets and property. . . . Eighth, It is hereby agreed that the first issue of the capital of the said company shall be £500,000 sterling, and that in issuing the same the shares shall be offered thus—(1) to the solvent contributories of the bank; (2) to the surrendering contributories; and (3) to the public. . . . And it is also agreed that the first issue of debentures of the said company shall be in total amount £580,000 sterling, and that they shall be offered thus—(1) to the creditors of the bank; (2) to the solvent contributories; and (3) to the surrendering contributories, and thereafter to the public. . . ."

Appended to the agreement, and referred to therein, was a state of the affairs of the bank shewing liabilities amounting in all to £1,338,116, 6s. 9d.; and assets amounting in all to £1,508,698, 12s. 1d., under the heads (1) cash due by bankers and cash on hand; (2) bills current; (3) bonds, debentures, stocks, &c.; (4) estates of large debtors; (5) heritable properties in Scotland; (6) balances of credit accounts and overdrafts; (7) bills current at the stoppage of the bank considered good; (8) past-due bills; (9) New Zealand and Australian Land Company's stock; (10) amount estimated as recoverable from contributories,—estimated surplus, £170,582, 5s. 4d.

went into liquidation on 22d October 1878, and he was placed upon the list of contributories as a holder of that stock, and thus became liable for calls amounting to £33,000. (Cond. 2) "The said William Shirres represented to the liquidators that he was unable to pay the said calls in full, and he emitted a solemn declaration," dated 15th April 1879, "under which he declared that his whole property and estate were truly and correctly disclosed in the answers which form part of said declaration. The property thus disclosed consisted of" (1) heritable property; (2) the surrender value of life policy; (3) shares of companies; (4) shares of ships; and (5) household furniture; the total net value, after deduction of preferable debts, being £11,210, 0s. 10d. That in reliance upon the said answers and relative declaration the agreement and discharge under reduction was executed, with the sanction of the Court, under which the said William Shirres was discharged of his liabilities on payment of £11,250 in addition to £6000 already paid.*

Shirres'
Trustees.

* The agreement and discharge sought to be reduced proceeded on the narrative that Mr Shirres had made the declaration, that the liquidators had agreed to accept the payment to be made by him as a compromise of the claims against him, and that the Court had interposed authority to the agreement, and exonerated and discharged him from all calls made (so far as unpaid) and to be made; Mr Shirres on the other hand assigning to the liquidators "his whole interest in the capital stock of the said bank, and in particular, without prejudice to the foresaid generality, all claims competent to him on any eventual surplus of the assets of the said bank, or of the calls made or to be made by the liquidators of the said bank . . . and renouncing all right which he, as a partner or contributory of the said bank, or his heirs, executors, or successors, has, have, or may have to participate in any benefits arising out of the assets of the said bank, or in virtue of the aforesaid assignation, or in any way connected with the said bank."

Among the answers were the following:—"(4) What is your regular or average annual income; and from what sources is it derived? (Specify the particulars, if necessary, in the separate signed list or schedule marked B.) (Ans. 4) My annual income previous to the bank's failure was about £1200, derived from the property now surrendered by me, but that is now gone. Having retired from business some years ago, and being now deprived of all my capital, I am without the means of earning an income, and am thus ruined." "(6) Have you any expectation of funds or property of any kind coming to you by succession or otherwise? If so, state its nature and probable value. (Ans. 6) None." "(8) State any circumstances connected with yourself, or those dependent on you, which you may wish to be considered along with your application. (Ans. 8) I refer to what is stated above under answer 4. I was induced to become a director in Aberdeen, and to purchase stock of the City of Glasgow Bank, and was, like others, deceived to my ruin by those at the head office. I am now penniless at sixty-seven years of age, with a family of seven children, one of whom is in feeble health, and unable to support himself, and three are still at their education." "(9) What sum or other consideration do you offer for a discharge in full of all claims by the liquidators against you as a shareholder of the City of Glasgow Bank; and in what manner do you propose it shall be secured or paid? Or, in view of continuing liable as a partner, what sum do you offer to pay to account; and in what manner and at what terms do you propose that it shall be secured or paid? (Ans. 9) Many of my shares of companies and ships are at present unrealisable, excepting at a great sacrifice, especially as my local stocks are also held largely by other Aberdeen shareholders of the bank, who have now to surrender. Most of the friends who might have helped me are involved with the bank, but if the

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 3) “The said declaration and relative answers did not contain a true, accurate, and complete statement of the said William Shirres’ affairs, means, and property. The said William Shirres did not disclose his whole assets, but, on the contrary, he fraudulently concealed several important assets belonging to him. In particular, at the date of the said declaration he held the following estate and effects, or the proceeds thereof, which were so concealed by him, viz.”—(1) A dwelling-house in Bon Accord Square, Aberdeen, value £1300; (2) two bonds and dispositions in security, dated in 1863 and 1864, and for £450 and £350 respectively; (3) shares in six companies specified of a value of £1182, of which shares amounting to £895 were in four companies mentioned in the list given up by the deceased with his declaration, and the remaining £287 were in companies not included in that list. “In addition to the assets above specified, the said William Shirres concealed other assets belonging to him and money in his possession to the extent of at least £40,000. The said William Shirres was well aware of the existence of the foresaid assets at the time when he emitted the said declaration and made the foresaid settlement with the liquidators. Explained that the property in Bon Accord Square, Aberdeen, remained vested in the said William Shirres till 19th October 1878, and that he did not account for or hand over to the liquidators either (1) the said property or the proceeds thereof, or (2) the sum contained in the said bond for £350. Quoad ultra the statements in answer, so far as inconsistent herewith, are denied.”

The defenders answered:—(Ans. 3) “The declaration and relative answers are referred to. Denied that the deceased fraudulently concealed any part of his estate. With reference to the particular items condescended on, the pursuers having raised no question until after the death of the said William Shirres, it is impossible for the defenders to give complete and detailed explanations, but they have ascertained the following facts”:—(1) The house in Aberdeen was sold in June 1878, before the liquidation, and the price was dealt with as part of Mr Shirres’ estate in the ordinary way. (2) The bond for £450 represented a loan to a relative. “At the date of the said declaration and answers the bond had been in existence for a period of sixteen years, and the deceased had never received any interest upon it. It is believed that in these circumstances this item had either escaped the deceased’s recollection, or was considered by him of no value, or that he had previous to that date resolved not to enforce the obligation.” The amount of the bond for £350 was paid to the deceased on 25th March 1879, before the date of the declaration and answers, and thus formed part of his general estate. (3) The defenders sum of £11,000 were accepted by the liquidators, I am hopeful that I should get friends to help me by advancing that sum, payable at one, four, and six months. They would do so in the expectation that if an improvement in the prices of my stocks shall occur, there will be a small balance for me, but looking to the probability of local stocks still falling, my friends are unwilling to undertake the risk of lending me the money on the shares at higher prices than those stated in my schedule.”

The declaration was a declaration to the effect that the answers “are true and correct answers to the printed queries prefixed thereto, to the best of my knowledge and belief; and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true.”

admitted that, with the exception of 50 shares in one company valued at £387 (which the defenders averred neither belonged to the deceased nor stood in his name) the shares specified by the pursuers stood in his name at the date of the declaration and were not included in his state of affairs, but the defenders averred that they believed that all the shares specified by the pursuers were held by the deceased in trust for other persons. The pursuers further averred ;—(Cond. 4) “ At the date of the said discharge Mr Shirres was a man of advanced years. In his said answers he stated that having retired from business some years before, and being deprived of his capital, he was without the means of earning income, and was thus ruined. The pursuers believe and aver that he did not save any money out of the earnings subsequent to the date of the discharge, and no means accrued to him by succession, gift, or otherwise. Nevertheless, at the date of his death on 1st January 1895, he was possessed of free assets (including the house 32 Bon Accord Terrace, Aberdeen) amounting to at least £43,000. He also left other heritable estate of considerable value, but the pursuers are not in a position to give specific details thereof. The statements in answer, so far as inconsistent herewith, are denied.”

The defenders answered :—(Ans. 4) “ The said answers are referred to. The deceased's age at the date of his discharge was sixty-seven. Admitted that deceased left estate amounting in value to about £43,000, including heritable property. Quoad ultra denied.” The defenders then proceeded to explain in detail that in consequence of exceptionally profitable transactions in relation to the property mentioned in his state of affairs, and particularly his shipping property, he had come to be possessed of £43,000 at his death.

The pursuers then averred ;—(Cond. 5) “ Neither the liquidators nor the pursuers became aware or had any means of informing themselves that the said William Shirres had concealed means and estate as aforesaid, until shortly after his death. The pursuers then became aware of the fact that he had left estate of the value of upwards of £40,000. This led to inquiries being made, and these inquiries resulted in the present action being instituted within a few days of the pursuers becoming aware of the fact that estate of great value had been concealed.”

The pursuers further averred ;—(Cond. 7) “ The pursuers are now in right of the whole assets of the City of Glasgow Bank, under and in virtue of the City of Glasgow Bank (Liquidation) Act, 1882, and relative discharge by the liquidators thereof in their favour, dated 12th October, and registered in the Books of Council and Session 30th December 1882, which are herewith produced and referred to. With reference to the statement in answer, it is denied that the pursuers are unable to put the defenders in the position in which Mr Shirres was at the date of the discharge. Quoad ultra reference is made to the discharge for its terms. In the event of its being held that the pursuers are bound to give restitutio in integrum, they are ready and willing and hereby offer to do so. Explained that Mr Shirres, as a contributory of the bank, was liable along with the other contributories to make good a deficiency of assets as compared with liabilities to the extent of nearly £6,000,000 sterling. The capital stock in the bank which he held was thus not merely of no value, but involved the foresaid large liability of the holder to contribute towards payment of the bank's debts. Mr Shirres purchased all his shares in the open market prior to 1873. Explained that even if Mr Shirres had paid up his calls in full, he would not have participated in any profits made by the pursuers' company, unless he had taken shares in same, and had paid up the full amount of the calls on said shares. Any benefit to be derived from holding said shares Mr Shirres could have obtained, if he had desired, either by obtaining an allotment of shares when the Company was formed, or by purchasing shares in the open market, which he could easily have done at or a little over par for a considerable time after its formation. The defenders may still, if they choose, participate in the future profits of the pursuers' company by purchasing shares therein."

The defenders answered ;—(Ans. 7) "The said Act and relative discharge are referred to. It is denied that the said Act gave the pursuers any right to sue the present action. The liquidation of the said bank came to an end, and the bank was dissolved on 14th March 1883. It is impossible for the pursuers to put the defenders in the position in which Mr Shirres was at the date of the discharge to him."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(4) Separatim, the said William Shirres having fraudulently concealed estate and effects belonging to him, and having thereby induced the liquidators of said bank to enter into the agreement and discharge libelled, and to obtain the sanction of the Court thereto, the pursuers, as now in right of the said liquidators, are entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for. (7) In any event, the pursuers having suffered loss and damage through the fraudulent misrepresentations and concealment of the said William Shirres to the amount of the sum concluded for in the alternative conclusion of the summons, decree should be pronounced in terms thereof.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The pursuers not offering, and it being impossible for them to give, restitutio in integrum, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the reductive and accounting conclusions of the summons. (5) The pursuers not having relevantly averred, and not having in fact suffered, any damage by the acts of the defenders' author, the defenders should be assoilzied. (10) Mora.

On 10th January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Before answer, allows the parties a proof of their averments, and the pursuers a conjunct probation."

The pursuers thereafter lodged the undernoted specification of documents, for the recovery of which they craved a diligence.*

Shirres'

The pursuers reclaimed, and the defenders took advantage of this reclaiming note to lodge a reclaiming note against the interlocutor of 10th January, allowing a proof.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The pursuers had no title to sue. Their only title was their Act, and if their Act did not give them a title, it was irrelevant to inquire in whom, if in anybody, the title to bring such an action as the present lay. Now, the definition clause (section 1) of the Act might, per se, be wide enough to carry claims against contributories who had obtained a settlement fraudulently, but that clause was controlled and limited by the agreement which was incorporated in the Act, and the agreement in turn incorporated the state of affairs appended to it. It was clear from the preamble of the Act, and from the agreement, that the main purpose of the Act was to enable the outstanding assets of the bank to be realised more advantageously than they could be in a liquidation, which demanded expedition. But that ratio had no application to such actions as the present; on the contrary, delay in bringing such actions gave rise, as here, to the plea of mora. Hence in the specific enumeration of the assets transferred to the pursuers, contained in the state of affairs of the bank, claims against surrendering contributories on the ground of fraud were not mentioned, and consequently were not transferred to the pursuers. Head 10 of that state of affairs ("amount estimated as recoverable from contributories") meant arrears due by existing contributories, not claims against contributories who had surrendered. In the previous cases the title of the pursuers was either assumed or the question was not necessary for the judgment.¹ (2) The action quoad the reductive conclusions was incompetent, because restitutio in integrum was now impossible.² The pursuers could not restore Mr Shirres or his representatives to the position of a non-surrendering contributory of the bank. It was no answer to this objection to say, as the pursuers did on record, that the defenders might buy shares in the pursuers' company in the open market. (3) The averments were irrelevant. The action was based on fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment, which required very distinct specification. Tried by that test, the general averment that the deceased had concealed assets to the extent of at least £40,000 was plainly irrelevant. Of the items specifically mentioned by the pursuers, the house in Aberdeen and the bond for £350 had, as the pursuers admitted, ceased to belong to the deceased as a matter of title at the date of his declaration, and he must be assumed to have accounted for the price of the house and for the sum in the bond when he paid the liquidators the £6000 or the £11,250. Of the shares specifically averred by the pursuers, £895 worth were in companies mentioned in the state of affairs given up by the deceased to the liquidators, and the notion of fraudulent under-statement of the amount of a holding was on the face of it absurd. The deceased must have been well aware that the liquidators would search the books of the companies which he mentioned, and when they found that his holding was larger than that stated by him, it could not be doubted that they satisfied themselves before accepting the surrender that the excess was not really the property of the deceased. There remained therefore only the bond for £450, and shares in companies not mentioned in the deceased's state of affairs of the value of £287; and it was out of the question to base a case of fraudulent concealment on the omission of these items alone. Lastly, there was the averment, or inference, in cond. 4. But as the basis of an action upon fraud, it was absurd to say that because a man died in 1895 worth £43,000 he was therefore guilty of fraud in 1879 when he arranged with the liquidators, or even that the circumstances raised such a presumption of fraud as to throw upon his executors the onus of shewing how he made his money. (4) At all events, the pursuers were barred by mora.¹ Had they brought their action in the lifetime of Mr Shirres his evidence would have been available, and he could have explained transactions regarding which there might be no books or other memoranda left. The theory of the pursuers seemed to be that surrendering contributories must either remain in poverty during the remainder of their lives or else that they were bound to keep full and accurate records of all their transactions with their property, otherwise they would be branded with the stigma of fraud after their death. To allow an action to proceed upon averments like those here, after the death of the person chiefly interested, would be contrary to the established rules of pleading. (5) Upon the question of the diligence, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was well founded, and ought to be affirmed. To certain parts of the specification the defenders could state no legitimate objection, assuming the relevancy of the action, but in so far as it was intended to support the pursuers' general averments of fraud, the diligence craved was nothing else than a fishing diligence of the most glaring description.

The pursuers were called upon to argue only the question of relevancy, and as to the diligence; and argued accordingly;—(1) The specific averments were in themselves clearly relevant. Then as to the general averments, the deceased, according to his answers in 1879, was an old man, incapable of earning anything and without expectations, yet he died in 1895 worth £43,000. That, taken in conjunction with the specific omissions, raised such a presumption as to entitle the pursuers to a general inquiry upon general averments. (2) If, then, the general averments were relevant, the pursuers' right to a diligence in terms of their specification followed as a matter of course. It was only by the aid of such a diligence that they could establish their general averments.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We had an argument stated to us on the first plea in law for the defenders that there was no title to sue. We did not call for a reply to that. It appears very clearly, I think, on the agreement and the Act of Parliament which followed upon it, that the assets of the bank, as regards any claim which the liquidators might have against any person who was a contributory to the liquidation, passed to the Assets Company, and that they could make it good. Now, that the liquidators in the liquidation would have a title to reduce a compromise made between them and a contributory, on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment, seems to me to be clear. And I have no doubt that the Assets Company being in their shoes would have the same right, and therefore I think the first plea in law for the defenders is properly repelled.

In regard to the relevancy of the action, I think it relevant; but we are not in the position at present of disposing of that matter finally at all, because we are only dealing with an interlocutor in which the Lord Ordinary has before answer allowed a proof. I do not think the judgment on this point ought to be interfered with.

The only remaining question is the question about this diligence. A great deal of what Mr Balfour has said, and which was also said by Mr Guthrie, is very forcible in the ordinary case, but this case is certainly peculiar in many respects, and in material respects. The case is, as stated in the record, that the late Mr Shirres gave up a statement to the liquidators of all he was worth, and represented that if he gave up the whole of that he became a penniless man at sixty-seven years of age, and out of business, and that they ought to compromise with him on the footing of that being all that he possessed, and that the company discovered on his death that in the inventory of his estate given up is certain property which was in his possession at the date of his statement, and which was not disclosed at the time of the compromise which was made with the liquidators, and the pursuers say that they are therefore entitled to recover proof of their averments from his repositories and from his books, if such exist. Of that I think there is no doubt whatever. The other articles of the specification are for the purpose of clearing up matters in regard to this property, which he is alleged to have possessed at the time of the compromise. I think that is a specification which in the special circumstances of this case ought to be allowed.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not mean to decide anything more in this case, neither do I think it at all necessary to decide anything more, than that upon the record before us we cannot dismiss this action, but must allow an inquiry, and I do not see how it can in the legitimate interests of both parties be more safely allowed than the Lord Ordinary has done, as in allowing a proof at large before answer. I think there must be an inquiry, and that that is the most legitimate and reasonably safe mode of making the inquiry.

As to the diligence, I think the pursuers are entitled to the diligence which they ask in the circumstances of the case, but I repeat that everything is quite open except that the action is competent at the instance of a party having a title to sue, and that there must be an inquiry; all the observations which were made by Mr Guthrie upon what is necessary to be established in order to warrant the reduction of such a deed as that which was executed in 1879, is quite open to contention between the parties upon the ascertained facts.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. There are two reclaiming notes before us, the first for the representatives of Mr Shirres, under which it was maintained that this action ought now to be dismissed and the proof which the Lord Ordinary has allowed refused. That was maintained chiefly on the ground that the pursuers have no title to sue the action at all. That is a prejudicial plea, which if sustained would exclude all inquiry. I do not know if it was argued before the Lord Ordinary, but he takes no notice of it. On that point I agree with your Lordships that there is a title in the pursuers, and that the defenders' plea should be repelled and the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof adhered to. In doing this nothing more is determined than that the case which the Assets Company have competently brought is one in which inquiry should be held, and that the proper form of that inquiry is as the Lord Ordinary has allowed it, proof before answer. That leaves open every possible argument, either as to competency of proof when tendered or sufficiency of proof when concluded.

The second reclaiming note is for the pursuers, against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor refusing the diligence asked by them. I agree with your Lordships that this diligence is of a very sweeping kind, but in the peculiar circumstances of this case I think it is only justice to the pursuers, and only justice to the defenders, that the fullest inquiry should be made into the facts on which the action is based. Such inquiry cannot be made unless the pursuers are granted a diligence such as they propose. I think the pursuers are entitled to the diligence they have sought, and therefore that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor refusing it should be recalled.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree to the course which your Lordships propose to take, on the understanding that everything is open except the questions of title and competency.

THE COURT, on 8th January 1897, pronounced the following interlocutors :—" Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the defenders against the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy, dated 10th January 1896, refuse the reclaiming note, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and repel the first plea in law for the defenders, and remit to the said Lord Ordinary to proceed in the cause as accords."

" Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the pursuers against the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy dated 18th November 1896 . . . find that the pursuers are entitled to a diligence in terms of their specification No. 28 of process : Therefore grant diligence in terms thereof."

On 26th January 1897 the defenders moved for leave to appeal to the House of Lords, arguing that it was proper to have the question of title to sue settled finally before any further procedure should take place in the case, as in the event of the defenders' plea to title being sustained further procedure would be unnecessary.

On 28th January the Court refused leave to appeal.

Reparation—Negligence—Liability of railway company for injury caused by defect in one of their waggons while used by another company—Relevancy.

No. 77. —In an action by a widow against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company to make them liable jointly and severally, or otherwise severally, in damages for the death of her husband, a carter in the employment of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, the pursuer made these averments:—That the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company had a contract, of the exact terms of which the pursuer was ignorant, with the Gas Commissioners at Dumfries for the haulage of coal arriving for the latter by the lines of either of these railway companies from the goods yard of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway by a private line to the premises of the Commissioners; that the deceased while in charge of a waggon in the operation of haulage was killed owing to defect in the brake of his waggon and a defect in the brake of a waggon in charge of another man behind him; that it was the custom of the Caledonian Railway Company “for convenience” in loading and unloading the coal to permit their own waggons to be taken beyond their own lines on to the lines of other railway companies or of consignees of coal without any express contract or charge being made in respect of such use of the waggons; that it was “for the advantage of the railway companies to give this accommodation”; that as regarded coal carried for the Commissioners by the Caledonian Railway Company, it was the regular practice to give the use of their waggons which had brought the coal to Dumfries for the conveyance of it to the gas-works, the haulage being performed by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway under their contract with the Gas Commissioners; that in pursuance of this practice the Caledonian Railway Company had given the use of the waggons in question. “It was accordingly their duty to take care that the waggons were in proper condition, and in particular that the brakes thereof were in good working order, but they had negligently failed to perform their duty.”

The Caledonian Railway Company pleaded that in respect the waggons were not in their possession nor under their control when the accident happened, the action, in so far as directed against them, was irrelevant.

Held (diss. Lord Trayner) that the case could not be decided without an inquiry into the terms, conditions, and circumstances in which the coals were being carried when the accident happened, and issue adjusted against both defenders.

Expenses—Expense of debate on relevancy at adjustment of issues.—Where, at the adjustment of issues in an appeal from the Sheriff Court for jury trial, the defender objected to the relevancy of the action, and the Court repelled the objection, held that the pursuer was entitled to the expenses of the discussion.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

In July 1896 Mrs Sarah Mulholland or Warwick, widow of Andrew Warwick, carter, Dumfries, raised an action of damages for the death of her husband, in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company, in which she prayed the Court to grant a decree ordaining the defenders, jointly and severally, or otherwise severally, to pay to the pursuer the sum of £500 in name of damages, or otherwise, in the event of its being found that the pursuer has a claim only under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, to grant a decree against the defenders the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for payment of £140, 8s.

The pursuer averred that on 22d October 1895 her husband, who was in the employment of the defenders the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company at Dumfries, was ordered by the foreman of the goods yard of that railway company, whose orders he was bound to obey, to assist in the haulage of certain waggons of coal from the goods yard of the railway company to the premises of the Dumfries Gas Commissioners. (Cond. 4) "The said Dumfries Gas Commissioners, whose premises are situated about 400 yards distant from the said goods yard, and are connected therewith by a line of rails laid along a public street, have (or had at the time referred to) a contract with the defenders the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for the haulage of coal consigned to them, and arriving at Dumfries either by the line of the defenders the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company or by the line of the defenders the said Caledonian Railway Company. The haulage under said contract is from the goods yard of the defenders the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company into the said Gas Commissioners' premises along the said line of rails, and the defenders the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company contract to perform this by means of their own horses and men. The precise terms of the contract are not known to the pursuer."

 Warwick v.
 Caledonian
 Railway Co.

The pursuer then averred;—On the 22d October there were four waggons of coal to be taken into the gas premises, and the deceased was put in charge of the first waggon.

The pursuer then set forth the way in which the accident happened, averring that it was caused by the brakes of the first and second waggons being defective;—(Cond. 13) "The said accident was caused by the negligence of the defenders. In the conduct of coal traffic it is the usual custom of the Caledonian Railway Company, and other railway companies, for convenience in the loading and unloading of coal, to send their waggons, or permit them to be taken, beyond their own lines on to the lines of other railway companies, and on to lyes or private lines or sidings belonging to consignors or consignees of coal, without any express contract or charge being made in respect of such use of the waggons. It is for the advantage of the railway companies to give this accommodation, as otherwise the trouble and expense of transhipping the coal from one waggon to another would be so great as to prejudice the trade of any railway company which refused it. In these circumstances, it is the duty, and is the practice, of the Caledonian Railway Company, and other railway companies, to take care that waggons, of which such use is given, are in proper working order, with a view to the safety of those who may have occasion to use and handle them in the loading, unloading, and delivery of the coal. As regards the coal conveyed by the defenders, the Caledonian Railway Company, for the Dumfries Gas Commissioners as consignees, it is, and for many years has been, the regular practice for the said defenders to give the use of the waggons belonging to them, in which coal has been carried from coal pits on their system of railway to Dumfries Station, for the conveyance of the coal from the station to the gas-works without necessity for any transhipment, the haulage being performed by the defenders the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company under their contract before mentioned. And in pursuance of this practice, the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company gave the use of the foresaid two waggons, Nos. 34,547 and 59,394, on the occasion in question. It was accordingly their duty to take care that the said two waggons were in proper condition for use, and, in particular, that the brakes thereof were of proper construction and in good working order; but they negligently failed to perform this duty, the brakes of both waggons, and in particular of the [second] waggon in charge of Burns, having been unserviceable and out of proper repair. Explained that, with a view to handing over said

No. 77. waggons for such haulage, it is the practice, by arrangement between the two defenders, for coals coming by the Caledonian Company's line to be booked through for delivery, not at their own station, but at the station of the Glasgow and South-Western Company at Dumfries; and not merely at the station, but at the very point beside their gate at Leafield Road, where the haulage along the tramway is to commence. The greater number of waggons so hauled are Caledonian waggons, as most of the Gas Commissioners' coals come by their line." (Cond. 14) "It is the duty of the defenders the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company before taking waggons belonging to the other defenders along the tramway line to the gas-works to inspect such waggons, and in particular to see that the brakes are in proper working order . . . The defenders were, however, at fault in having no such system of inspection, and on the occasion in question the said defenders did not inspect the foresaid two waggons, and took no steps to see whether the brakes thereof were in good working order. . . ."

Jan. 28, 1897.
Warwick v.
Railway Co.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defenders the said Caledonian Railway Company, being the owners of the said insufficient and defective waggons, and having negligently allowed them to be used in their defective condition on the occasion in question, are liable to the pursuer in compensation for the loss sustained by her through said accident. (4) The defenders the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, having adopted said waggons for their contract of haulage, and the same having formed part of their plant for the time being, with a corresponding duty of inspection thereof, are liable to the pursuer in compensation for the accident caused by the defective and insufficient condition of said waggons.

The defenders the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company pleaded;—(2) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant. (7) The said defenders not being owners of the waggons in question, and their contract in relation thereto being merely for haulage and not for carriage as common carriers, the waggons being the property of the Caledonian Railway Company, the Caledonian Company and the Gas Commissioners are responsible for their condition, and the South-Western Company are not liable for any accident occurring through any defect in them.

The defenders the Caledonian Railway Company pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant. . . . (4) The waggons consigned on, not being in the possession or under the control of these defenders when the said accident occurred, they should be absolved. (5) The waggons consigned on having been in the possession and under the control of the other defenders, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, when the accident occurred, they are alone responsible for the sufficiency of the said waggons, and these defenders should be absolved.

On 1st December 1876 the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial to the Second Division of the Court of Session, and proposed a separate issue as applicable to each of the defenders.

Argued for the Caledonian Railway Company;—The action as directed against them was irrelevant, and no issue should be allowed. The waggons, doubtless, were their property, but no liability arose merely ex dominio.¹ The work which was being done was not railway work, or work for which these defenders could be made responsible. On the averments, it was not a case of joint user on the defenders' respective lines, but a several user over each line. The obligations of the Caledonian Railway Company ceased when the waggons were brought to the station at Dumfries. No liability could attach to them because, as matter of convenience to the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, they had allowed them to pass on the waggons to the Gas Commissioners. Heaven v. Pender,² relied on by the pursuer, was inapplicable. In it the owner of the dock invited the public upon a warranty that all the dock's equipments were safe. Moreover, it was to be gathered from the opinions of Lord Justice Cotton and Lord Justice Bowen that the decision did not depend upon the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls.

Warwick v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was relevant against the Caledonian Railway Company. They knew that the waggons were to be used by the other defenders for their special purposes, and having supplied defective waggons in that knowledge, they were liable in the consequences.³ Both the companies were interested in seeing that the coal was conveyed to the gas-works, and there was a distinct averment that the Caledonian Railway Company benefited thereby, and agreed that their waggons should be used for the purpose. They were bound to see that they were in safe condition.⁴

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action of damages brought against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company claiming damages for a calamity which occurred in the course of hauling some waggons loaded with coal from the railway station at Dumfries to the gas-works, which were the destination of the coal. One of the grounds on which damages are sought—one of the faults alleged as the foundation of the claim of damages—is that the waggons were in a faulty condition, which made them unsafe to be used for the purpose of taking the coals from the station along the street tramway—I think said to be about 400 yards long—to the gas-works; that they were not provided with sufficient brakes necessary to prevent such danger as might arise in the course of the operation, and which did arise here, and was not prevented in consequence. So far as the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company are concerned, there is no question; they admit the relevancy of the action, and the issue may be adjusted as with them. But the Caledonian Railway Company maintain that they are not responsible for the condition of the waggons; that they were not taking them along the street by the street tramways from the railway station to the gas-works; that they were in the hands of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and that that company must be liable for the condition of the waggons, and that if the waggons were in an unsafe state it was for the South-Western Company to see to it. The Glasgow and South-

No. 77. Western Railway Company, who do not object to the relevancy of the case, say that in point of fact they had nothing to do with the waggons except to supply horses and men to haul them from the railway station along the street to the gas-works ; that their contract was one of haulage only, and that they had only to put the horses into the waggons that were brought there to them, and haul them along the tramways to the gas-works, and that if there was any defect in the waggons it was the Caledonian Railway Company, to whom they belonged, that were to blame. Now, the Caledonian Railway Company say that they were not employed to furnish waggons to carry the coals from the station along the street to the gas-works, and that it was a matter, I think Mr Balfour put it, of favour on their part to allow the use of their waggons quite gratuitously for that purpose. Well, I am not prepared to decide anything about their liability without evidence such as will be adduced at the trial as to the contract or contracts upon which the coals were being taken from the station to the gas-works when the accident occurred. The pursuer says here very properly—the fact being so—that she is ignorant of the details of any contract in the matter, and all that she can affirm in point of fact is that the usage, the thing which was done daily, or at least constantly, was that the Caledonian Railway Company brought the coals along their line from Lanarkshire to Dumfries, supplying as far as the station there not only the line of railway, which was theirs, but also the waggons and the haulage, and after that the haulage was done by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. The Glasgow and South-Western Company affirm that they had employment only to do the haulage—to furnish the horses and the men—and the pursuer says that the one or the other must be responsible to her for the condition in which the waggons were. I say I think we cannot decide upon the liability of the Caledonian Company or non-liability of the Caledonian Company without evidence as to the contract. Prima facie it seems improbable, to the extent of being absurd, to suppose that the Caledonian Company, from mere love and favour either to the coal owners or to the Glasgow and South-Western Company, or to the Gas Company in Dumfries, are to supply their waggons practically for nothing to carry coal along the 400 yards of tramway on the street, and to be brought back again. The coals cannot be carried to the gas-works without waggons as well as haulage, and mercantile companies and trading companies—and the Caledonian Railway Company and the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company are just such, the one supplying the waggons and the other the haulage—will do nothing for love, favour, and affection for anybody, but will only act in the ordinary course of their business for a pecuniary consideration. Whether the payment to the Caledonian Company is made in their general charge for conveyance of coals or otherwise, or whether it is a mere consideration that on the whole it is profitable for them to furnish the waggons for this, they are paid for it, and it would be imputing something ridiculously weak to the managers of the company to say that they did this, not in the course of their business, and for their own advantage in the course of business, but as Mr Balfour put it, from love, favour, and affection for anybody in the world. But it is sufficient to say that I think we cannot decide the question which will really arise between the companies, one of whom is responsible for the state of the waggons, without an inquiry such as must take place in regard to the terms and conditions and circumstances in which the coals were being carried in these waggons when the accident happened. I am therefore of opinion that we must allow the case to go to trial at the pursuer's instance against both the defenders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that no case has been averred by the pursuer relevant to infer liability on the part of the Caledonian Company for the damages claimed.

At the time the pursuer's husband was killed he was engaged in his ordinary employment as a servant of the other defenders, the Glasgow and South-Western Company, conveying coals from the Company's terminus to the premises of the Gas Company. The coals being so conveyed were in waggons belonging to the Caledonian Company, the same waggons in which they had brought the coals from the colliery to Dumfries. I assume that these waggons were defective, and that such defect occasioned or materially contributed to the death of the pursuer's husband. The waggons were not, however, at the time of the accident in the possession of or being used by their owners.

The connection of the Caledonian Company with the coals in question ceased when the coals reached the railway terminus at Dumfries. Their contract was to carry the coals to Dumfries—not to deliver them at the Gas Company's premises. This is obvious from the fact that the Glasgow and South-Western Company had a separate and independent contract for the conveyance of the coals from the terminus to the Gas Company's premises, which would not have existed had the Caledonian Company been bound to deliver them there. This, indeed, is not matter of inference; it is averred by the pursuer in cond. 13. Accordingly, it is clear that the pursuer's husband when he met with his death was acting as the servant of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company in the execution of their work,—work with which the Caledonian Company had no concern. But the work was being done with plant or appliances belonging to the Caledonian Company. How came they there? The pursuer explains this in cond. 13. For the convenience of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and to save transshipment of the coals, the Caledonian Company allowed their waggons, in which the coals had been brought from the colliery to Dumfries, to be taken beyond their own line and on to the lines of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and by the latter taken along the tramway through the public street to the Gas Company's premises. This use of the waggons was not given under any contract between the two railway companies—there was no obligation on the Caledonian Railway to give it—it was done, as the pursuer says, simply “for convenience.” It may be that it was ridiculous for them to do so, but we must take the facts to be as the pursuer states them. In these circumstances, how stands the matter of liability for the defective condition of the waggons, and the consequence of such defective condition? I have no doubt of the liability of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. The work was theirs, the waggons were theirs, or under their sole control pro tempore, the servant who was injured was theirs, to whom they were under an obligation to provide safe and sufficient appliances for the work to be done. None of these things can be said of the Caledonian Company. All that can be said, and all that is said, against that company is, (1) that the waggons were their property, and (2) that they were defective. The first of these statements is irrelevant. No action of damages can arise ex dominio. The second appears to me to be just as irrelevant. The Caledonian Company were under no obligation to give waggons to the deceased or his employers. They had no duty whatever to fulfil towards the deceased or his employers in reference to the waggons. "For convenience" they lent their waggons to the other company, no "charge being made" for such loan. They did not guarantee or represent their waggons to be anything but what they actually were. "There are our waggons; use them if it is a convenience to you" was the only condition of the loan. Assuming the pursuer's statements, I do not question that the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company were under obligation to see that the waggons they used under such a permission were fit for the use to which they put them. That was a duty which they owed to their own servants. But I think the Caledonian Company was not under such an obligation, and certainly not in any question like the present, arising out of a disaster resulting from the use of the waggon to one of the user's servants in course of their use. But it is averred that this lending of waggons was "the usual custom," and "the regular practice for many years." Take it so; the practice and custom had a beginning. If there was no obligation or duty on the part of the Caledonian Company to see that the waggons they lent were sufficient for the purpose to which somebody else was to put them at the beginning of the practice (as I think clearly there was not) the continuance of the practice would not create such an obligation. If one lends his carriage to another, and the borrower puts in his own horses, and has them driven by his own coachman on his own business or pleasure, and an accident follows through the breaking down of the carriage, I should have thought that the borrower of the carriage was liable, not the owner. The fact that this was done a dozen times would not alter the incidence of the liability. To sustain this action against the Caledonian Company is, however, to make the owner, not the borrower, of the carriage liable, and such a result is not, in my opinion, well founded or consistent with the rules of our law.

LORD YOUNG.—I wish to make an explanation. I did not state that it was ridiculous for the Caledonian Company for convenience to allow their waggons to be used for the business matter of carrying coals from the railway station to the gas-works. What I characterised as ridiculous was the statement that they did that gratuitously, and that remuneration for it was not included in their charges. I should like also to add that there is no suggestion of a loan by the Caledonian Railway Company to the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company repudiated the notion of any loan. They said they had no concern with supplying the waggons for carrying the coal; that they put their horses, guarded by their men, into the waggons which were brought there with the coal; that they had nothing to do with them, and were paid for nothing but supplying the horses. They say so very distinctly. "The Glasgow and South-Western Company were engaged in merely performing the haulage of the waggons, which were not their own property, and the Gas Commissioners and the other defenders were solely responsible for the condition of the waggons, which were not lent to them." Warwick v.

Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD TRAYNER.—Allow me to say that my view is not changed. I think there is a distinct statement practically of loan, although the word loan may not be used. In looking at the relevancy of a record I should not consider it my duty to look at the statement of the defenders.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

Counsel for pursuer moved for the expenses of the discussion against the Caledonian Railway Company.

Counsel for the Caledonian Railway Company objected on the ground that the discussion took place on the adjustment of issues. He moved that the question of expenses be reserved.

LORD YOUNG.—It was a serious argument on relevancy and taken to avizandum. I think you are entitled to expenses. We should proceed by some rule. If we are to give expenses when the relevancy is disputed and we sustain the relevancy and adjust the issue, then this is a case for it. If we are, as a rule, to reserve the expenses, then this is a case for reserving them. I thought the rule was to give expenses when we rejected the argument against the relevancy.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think so.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is a general practice.

THE COURT approved of the issues, and found the Caledonian Railway Company liable to the pursuer in the expenses of the discussion.

Trustees v.
Freer.

By his first codicil the truster authorised his trustees "as they shall think best, either, first, to dispose of my business in Melrose at any time, or second, to make arrangements for carrying on the same until one or other of my sons, if they elect to follow out the profession, is ready to take it up for himself or in partnership; and in so carrying on said business I authorise my said trustees to allow any sum not exceeding £2500 to remain as capital in said business on such terms as they may arrange."

The truster had for many years carried on business as a solicitor and bank-agent in Melrose. Prior to the death of his father, which took place in 1881, he carried on business in partnership with his father under the firm name of Allan & John Freer. After the death of his father, and until a few weeks before his own death, he carried on the business for his own behoof, without any partner, under the same firm name, and he was doing so at the date of the execution of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils.

Shortly before his death the truster assumed as a partner Mr Thomas Temple Muir, S.S.C., the business being thereafter carried on under the firm of Freer & Muir. By the contract of copartnership between Mr Freer and Mr Muir, dated 31st December 1892, and 2d January 1893, the copartnership was to endure to 31st December 1906, but with power to either party to put an end to it at 31st December 1899. The contract contained the following articles:— (Eighth) "In the case of the death of the said John Freer during the currency of this contract, two-thirds of the future profits of the business shall thereafter belong to the said Thomas Temple Muir, and one-third thereof to the representatives of the said John Freer during the remaining period fixed for the endurance of the copartnership. . . .
(Ninth) In the event of the death of the said John Freer during the currency of this contract, his representatives shall be entitled to require the said Thomas Temple Muir at any time during its currency, or at the end of the period fixed for the endurance of the copartnership, to assume as a partner one of the said John Freer's sons, and that for a period of seven years after the date of the expiry of this contract, and to give to the son so assumed" a certain proportion of the profits, "and that on terms and conditions similar to those contained in this contract; and on such assumption taking place, the right and interest of the said John Freer's representatives in the profits of the said business shall thenceforth cease, or otherwise in lieu of such assumption it shall be in the option of the representatives of the said John Freer to require the said Thomas Temple Muir to pay to them the sum of [sum stated] per annum out of the profits of the said business for a period of five years after the date of the expiry of this contract." The powers referred to in the ninth article of the contract had not been exercised by Mr Freer's representatives at the date when this case was presented.

A question having arisen as to whether the share of the profits of the business to which Mr Freer's representatives were entitled under the contract of copartnery ought in a question with the life-rentrix, Mrs Freer, to be treated as income, and so fall to her, or as capital of which she was merely to have the life-rent or annual income, this special case was presented to the Court by (1) Mr Freer's trustees, and (2) his widow.

 Freer's
 Trustees v.
 Freer.

The first parties contended that the share of profits was of the nature of an annual payment out of profits by Mr Muir in respect of goodwill, and ought to be treated as capital, and that it was the intention of the truster that it should form part of the capital of his estate, in respect it was not a permanent, but merely a temporary source of income.

The second party contended, on the other hand, that it was her husband's intention that the whole annual income to be derived from his means was to belong to her, that the share of annual profits which fell to be paid "to the representatives of said John Freer," formed part of the income of his means, and was to be treated as income of which she was to have the "free life-rent use and enjoyment" (subject to the maintenance and education of her children) as provided in Mr Freer's settlement.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“Is the share of the profits to which Mr Freer's representatives are entitled to be treated as capital or income by his trustees?”

Argued for the first parties;—The power which the truster had given to his trustees by his codicil was entirely superseded by the contract of copartnery, and the goodwill had passed to the surviving partner. The trustees had a mere jus crediti in respect of the business, a right to call upon the surviving partner, to whom the goodwill had accrued, to pay one-third of the profits. These profits did not represent income accruing from residue in the hands of the trustees, nor were they the profits of a business belonging to and administered by the trustees. They were merely debt which the trustees under the copartnery contract had right to ingather as it accrued. Where profits arose from a going business which the trustees were carrying on, they were no doubt to be treated as income. But unless they were the produce of means and estate held and administered by the trustees, they could not be considered as the income of the capital held by them under the will. The second party was only entitled to the life-rent or annual income of the profits treated as capital.¹

Argued for the second party;—The terms of the codicil shewed that the truster intended that the capital of his estate should remain in the business, of which he was then sole partner, and be administered by the trustees until it should be seen if one of his sons should elect to take up the business. The reasonable view was, that whatever profits came in in the interval should go to his widow, to whom he had left the life-rent of the residue in his trust-settlement. This intention could not be defeated by the subsequent contract of copartnery, and must receive effect in the altered circumstances. It followed, then, that the profits of the business must be treated as income, of which the second party was to have the free life-rent use, as provided by the trust-settlement. There was no "goodwill" in a solicitor's business,² and the

Trustees v.
Freer.

LORD ADAM.—The question submitted to us in this special case arises thus. Mr Freer, who was a law-agent and solicitor, left a trust-disposition by which he conveyed his estate to trustees, and after directing certain small payments, made the following provision as to the residue :—[His Lordship here quoted the terms of the fourth purpose of the trust, and proceeded.] He also left a codicil, dated 13th October 1892, at which time he was carrying on business alone. But before his death the position of matters changed, for in December of 1892 he entered into partnership with Mr Muir, with whom he executed a contract of copartnery. That contract is not fully set out, but we see from the 8th and 9th provisions that on the death of Mr Freer two-thirds of the future profits of the business were to belong to Mr Muir and one-third was to be paid to Mr Freer's representatives. His trustees were entitled to require Mr Muir to take into partnership one of Mr Freer's sons, and the duration of the contract was to be for fourteen years, with power to either party to break it at the end of seven.

The question before us is whether the one-third of the profits payable by Mr Muir to Mr Freer's trustees, which will be payable alternatively till the year 1899 or 1906, is capital or income.

My view is that these payments are part of the residue of the estate, and that accordingly Mrs Freer is only entitled to the enjoyment of the interest on them. So far as we have seen from the contract, Mr Muir became the sole partner on Mr Freer's death. The trustees are not partners, and are not entitled to interfere with the management of the business; and accordingly Mr Muir is entitled to uplift the whole profits, and only then does the claim of the trustees to one-third come in. It appears to me that that is only a debt due by Mr Muir to the trustees, which they can enforce against him every year, and that it is like any other debt, as if he had bound himself under a bond to make such payment to the trustees. It is part of the residue, and it follows that the provisions of the codicil apply to a state of affairs which has ceased to exist. There might have been a different question if the trustees had carried on the business in accordance with the terms of the codicil, and had allowed certain capital to remain in the business, and in that case the profits might have gone to Mrs Freer. But that consideration does not apply now, and accordingly the case must be determined in accordance with the terms of the settlement and of the obligations in the contract. Construing the two together, I come to the conclusion that the share of profits falls into the residue, and that Mrs Freer is only entitled to the income therefrom.

LORD M'LAREN.—The late Mr Freer made a will and codicil some years before his death, but within a month of that event he entered into a contract of copartnery which was to endure for fourteen years, with right to himself or his partner to terminate the contract at the end of seven years.

The right of Mr Freer's representatives under the contract of copartnery is a right to receive a share of profits, and it is to last for seven years in any event, and possibly for fourteen years. Part of that time has expired, but we have to consider the case as at the testator's death. The right of the trustees at the present time is to receive one-third of the profits of the business carried on by the partner of the deceased Mr Freer, and the question is, whether this annual payment is to be made over to Mrs Freer as "liferent of residue," or whether it is to be considered residue, so that the lady shall only enjoy the annual return from this sum treated as capital or residue.

Trustees v.
Freer.

There have been, as counsel stated, decisions upon questions which are nearly related to this, but I think in common with Lord Adam that the questions are not identical.

A testator who wishes to give the income or interest of his estate to his widow or child may express his intention to do so in different ways. He may give a share of the income of the trust, or he may give a provision in the form of the liferent or annual return from the capital of the estate. At first sight it may seem that there is not much difference between these. But when one comes to deal with a terminable interest the distinction arises very sharply between the two forms of expression, because according to the latest decision, if the testator gives the income, it would include everything coming in within the year, whether of the nature of annual return or capital payment.

Of course there is no absolute rule, but according to *Strain's*¹ case the presumption seems to be that recurrent payments fall under income. But if the annual interest which is given to the widow or child is clearly marked as the return on the capital of the estate, I cannot see how such a provision could be construed so as to include capital sums coming to the trust in the shape of annual instalments.

We are not favoured with a complete copy of the contract of copartnery, and I have no doubt the parties were well advised that it was not necessary for the question which they desired to submit that the Court should have it. Without seeing the whole contract, I am unable to offer an opinion as to whether the payment which the trustees are now receiving is of the nature of goodwill or debt, or whether it is such a share of the profits as would make the trustees partners. I daresay it is not a very practical question, because a law-agent's business is usually not a hazardous one. But for the purposes of the present question it is not material to consider what is the true nature of the claim. We can at least predicate of the payment that it is one which will probably end in seven years, and that it is not derived from the investment of part of the capital of the trust-estate. It is a payment under contract, and I cannot see how an annual payment under contract can be treated as a liferent of residue. If that is so, it leads necessarily to a determination against Mrs Freer and in favour of the trustees.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT gave an affirmative answer to the first alternative of the question of law.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Master's liability for plant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 1, subsec. 1—Defect in "ways" and "works."—A labourer, employed by the contractor for the brickwork in an unfinished house, was injured by the breaking of a step while carrying a load of bricks up the stair of the house.

In an action of damages brought by the labourer against his employer, on the ground that the step was defective, and that the accident had been caused by the defender's negligence in not having the ways to be used by his workmen inspected, it was proved that the stair was the permanent stair of the house, and had been completed two days before the accident by the mason employed by the builder, and that there was nothing to lead the defender to suspect that the stair was defective.

Held that no negligence had been proved on the part of the defender, he being entitled to rely on the fact that the stair was constructed by a competent tradesman, and was the permanent stair of the house.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

In May 1896 Samuel M'Inulty, labourer, Paisley, raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Paisley against George Primrose, brickbuilder and contractor there, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred that he was on 11th March 1896 employed by the defender, who was contractor for the brickwork at the building of a tenement of dwelling-houses in Paisley, and that while he was carrying a hod full of bricks from the street to an upper storey, the bottom step of the staircase broke in the centre, causing him to fall to the ground, and that he sustained injuries.

He further averred that the accident was caused by a defect in the step, which arose from, and was not discovered and remedied owing to, the negligence of the defender, "who in no way inspected or examined as to the condition or sufficiency of the ways over which his workmen were required to travel."

The defender in answer stated,—“Explained that the step in question was part of the permanent stair erected for the purpose of giving access to the upper storeys of the building, and that it was not made nor built in by the defender nor under his supervision. The erection of the stair was not part of his contract.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The injuries sustained by the pursuer having been caused through the fault or negligence of the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, the pursuer is entitled to compensation as craved. (2) The pursuer having sustained injuries in the manner libelled, the ways, works, and plant in use by the defender being defective, he is entitled to compensation for said injuries.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's alleged injuries not having been caused by any fault or negligence of the defender, or of anyone for whom he is responsible, the defender should be assoilized from the conclusions of the action.

¶ A proof was allowed, from which the following facts appeared:—The steps of the stair were formed of granolithic, and were placed in position two days before the accident by Mr Barr, builder, Paisley, proprietor of the tenement, who was himself doing the mason work, and the defender was employed by him generally to supply certain brickwork for the support of the stair. It was proved that the accident happened to the pursuer through the breakage from some cause—probably internal defect—of the step. The step was apparently in good condition when the pursuer used it. The staircase was the regular access to the upper storeys of the building, and had been used as such since its construction by the different classes of tradesmen working at the tenement. The defender deposed,—“I supposed that the stair being the permanent stair intended for the building would be quite capable of supporting all that went on it. I assumed, seeing that it was being erected by Mr Barr, who was also proprietor of the building, that it was all right and good and sufficient.”

No. 79.

M'Inulty v.
Primrose.

On 7th July 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) found that the defender was responsible for the accident on the ground that “the step apparently gave way through a defect in it, which might have been discovered if properly examined, and also because of the want of a centre butt to support it, it being the bottom step of the stair,” and assessed the damages at £50.

On appeal the Sheriff (Cheyne) pronounced this interlocutor on 9th September:—“Finds (3) that the said stair was erected two days before the accident, by the proprietor of the building, who is a builder to trade, and was doing the mason work himself: Finds (4) that, though the defender made no examination of the said stair before permitting his servants to use it, no negligence has been established against him inferring liability for the consequences of the accident, he being entitled to rely on the fact that the stair was constructed by a competent tradesman, and was intended for the use, not only of the workmen connected with the building operations, but also of the future occupants of the building, and it not being proved that an examination would have disclosed any defect in the condition of the step which gave way: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action.”

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The accident was one which would not happen in the ordinary course of things where proper care was used. It afforded reasonable evidence of negligence, and placed the onus of explaining it upon the defender.¹ It had been laid down that where an accident happened of this nature,—e.g., in the case of a man ordered by his employer to mount a ladder which collapsed,—it was not necessary for the pursuer to prove the specific defect which caused the accident.² Here, within two days of the construction of the stairs, the pursuer had mounted them by the defender's orders, and the defender clearly had a duty of inspection to see that they were in sound condition, or he should have supplied an independent scaffolding for his own labourers. No action could lie at the pursuer's instance against the actual builder of the steps,³ and consequently he must have a title to sue the defender, who was responsible to his servant.

Argued for the defender;—He had nothing to do with building the stair beyond putting up the brick supports, which had remained firm. The fact that the accident was extraordinary was really a favourable feature for the defender. The cases of *Fraser*⁴ and *Olsen*⁵ had been explained in Macfarlane v. Thompson,¹ and the rule now was that where the cause of the accident was not ascertained, the fact that it took place did not raise any presumption that it was caused by a defect in the plant for which the master was responsible, but that the pursuer must prove that the cause of the accident was some defect for which the master was responsible. Here the defender was called in to work in another man's premises, and was entitled to hold, without special examination, that the work done by a competent tradesman was sufficient for the purpose for which it was intended, e.g., that the stair was strong enough to give safe access to the upper storeys.²

First, it is said that this step, which in the event broke down, was weak on account of deficient support, and it is sought to connect the respondent with it. He did not supply the step, but was ordered by a builder to perform certain brickwork for its support.

Now, if the pursuer is to make anything of this, it is incumbent upon him to shew that the respondent had the option to determine what amount of brickwork was necessary to support a given staircase. But his case is deficient in this part of it. As I read the evidence, he was not instructed to consider as to what support was needed, nor informed of the strength or the weight of the step which was to be supported. He was merely bidden to build certain brickwork which his employer considered adequate to support the step. This seems a mere incident in the case, and does not make the respondent responsible for the staircase as a whole. It is not very well made out what was the reason of the breakdown, although I should be disposed to think, as did the Sheriff, that it was due to some internal defect in the step itself. But inasmuch as it was the stair which gave way, and not the brickwork, which stood till it was pulled down by the fall of the step, there can be no question of liability on that head.

But turning to the second and more important question, I deal with it upon the assumption which I have now made, that the respondent was not in fault in the construction of the fabric. What was his duty in allowing the men to use the stair as an access to the upper storey? We could not support the pursuer without affirming so wide a proposition as to lead to unforeseen and ludicrous consequences. As I read the evidence, there was work to be done upon the upper part of the building, and the staircase was completed. It is clearly proved that all which was ever to be done to build the staircase had been done when the men used it.

Accordingly, the case is substantially in the same position as it would be where a contractor had agreed to do certain work in the upper part of a dwelling-house. Could it be said that he was to go and test the staircase which had been used by the inhabitants of the house? Good sense revolts against the idea, and yet upon the facts in question it appears that the construction of the staircase was complete. It is a mere circumstance, perhaps, but it had been already used by workmen carrying loads up it. It is enough that the staircase of the house had been built, and that it was the stair of a dwelling-house, and that the defender had no reason to suspect its stability. In these circumstances I cannot lay it down that a prudent man would either test the staircase or resort to the absurd superfluity of building a scaffolding for gaining access to the upper storey of a house which had already a staircase. I am for adhering to the Sheriff's interlocutor.

No. 79.

M'Inulty v.
Primrose.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The defender was under a contract to execute the brickwork, and the pursuer was employed by him to carry out that work, and in the course of the work he met with an accident resulting in injuries, in consequence of which he has raised the present action. I agree that it has not been proved that the defender was responsible for the absence of that part of the brickwork which was erected to support the step after the accident happened. Accordingly, if the alleged injury was caused by a defect in the broken step, the defender has not been connected with such defect, and the accident was not due to his direct negligence.

But what happened was, that after the brickwork had been finished and the staircase had been completed, forming a permanent access to the upper storeys of the house, the defender sent the pursuer to execute some work in the upper storeys, and while he was using the staircase in the ordinary course, it so happened that a step broke. Now, there was no fault on the part of the defender, unless it can be shewn that he ought not to have allowed his workmen to go on the stair before he had personally examined it. There is no rule of law of that sort upon which the pursuer can rely. In a case like this, one tradesman is entitled to assume that material supplied by another tradesman is sufficient for the purpose for which it is supplied. There may be exceptions to this rule, it is difficult to figure circumstances which would give rise to them, but this case falls under the general rule, that there is no duty of personal inspection.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that there is no reason to doubt the generality of the rule that an employer of labour, engaging men to work for him on property which he hires or purchases for the purposes of his business, is responsible at common law for the sufficiency of what are termed in the statute the "ways, works, machinery, or plant." The liability is a common law one, but the words are specifically used for the first time in the statute. That statute intended only to displace the objection that might be raised of "common employment," and thus to give to the workman the same remedy as he would have had if he had not been employed at the time of meeting with an accident. Now, a great part of the trade of this country is done by employers in property which is not their own, nor subject to their control. That is very commonly the case in the building trade, where work is constantly done by employers on the property of others. There is no doubt that as to the sufficiency of scaffolding, ropes, or other plant which he brings to the ground, an employer is just as responsible as when he is carrying on work on his own property. It is only fair that the rule should be so, for, as he purchases scaffolding and ropes, it is his duty

No. 79. either to get them from a dealer who will give him reliable materials, or to subject them to the usual tests for ascertaining their strength and sufficiency. But when it is a case of the liability of an employer for injury sustained by a workman arising from the insufficiency of appliances on the ground, whether part of the original structure existing there, or the work of an independent contractor engaged on contract work, the responsibility must be defined by some working test or rule which will not break down when we come to apply it to the business of life. In the absence of any special rule suggested by experience or by the peculiarities of the work, it seems to me that we should apply the general criterion as to responsibility for fault which is to be found in the Roman law, and in the works of our institutional writers, viz., whether the employer has exercised that measure of skill and care which a prudent man would shew in the management of his own affairs. I cannot think that if in a case of this kind the defender had probable grounds for believing in the sufficiency of the staircase for his own purposes when going about the premises at which he was at work, he would be compelled to use greater precautions for the safety of his employees. The defender, when examined on this point, stated explicitly that as the step in question was part of the permanent stair erected for giving access to the upper storeys, he naturally supposed that it would support the burdens put upon it. That being the defender's explanation, the question is, has he discharged the responsibility which the law has laid upon him? Was he entitled, as a prudent man, to trust to the sufficiency of the stair? In my judgment he was, and to make him responsible it must be shewn that something brought prominently before him the question of the sufficiency of the stair,—that he had grounds for believing that it was or might be unsafe,—and that he had allowed his workmen to take the risk without warning them. I agree with the Lord President that this case is the same in all respects as if the work were being done on finished premises, and accordingly I see no grounds for holding the defender responsible.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff, dated 9th September 1896, and in law find the defender is not liable in damages: Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the said interlocutor, and decern."

Rutherglen.

Section 12 enacts that in the case of a burgh whose police boundary is within its municipal boundary or royalty, or within its parliamentary boundary, it shall be lawful for the council or the commissioners of the burgh “to resolve to extend such police boundary to the municipal boundary, or the royalty, or the parliamentary boundary respectively, for police purposes. . . . Upon any such resolution being adopted, the council or the commissioners of the burgh may present a petition to the Sheriff praying him to confirm the same, and the Sheriff, after such intimation and service as he thinks proper, and after hearing all parties interested, shall dispose of the application, and upon any final judgment confirming the resolution being pronounced, it shall be recorded in the Sheriff Court Books, and said resolution shall come into force from the date of such recording or such later date or dates as may be specified in the resolution.”

Section 13 gives a right to present a petition to the Court of Session against deliverances under section 11 or section 12.

Held that under section 12 the Sheriff, or the Court of Session, must either confirm the resolution of magistrates to extend the boundaries of the burgh simpliciter or refuse confirmation, and that therefore it is not competent to confirm the resolution as regards part of the area resolved to be added, and to refuse confirmation as regards the rest of the area.

Held further that in an application for confirmation of a resolution of magistrates under section 12, it is the duty of the Sheriff, or the Court, to consider all reasonable grounds of objection to the confirmation, including objections based on the number of dwelling-houses in the area proposed to be added and the amount of its population.

Circumstances in which the Court in a petition under section 13 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, for recall of a deliverance of the Sheriff confirming a resolution of magistrates to extend the boundaries of a burgh, recalled the deliverance of the Sheriff, and refused to confirm the resolution.

The Court refused a motion by the petitioners for expenses, Lord Young observing that the proceedings were not a litigation.

UNDER the Reform Act of 1832 the parliamentary burgh of Rutherglen included a portion of the ancient royalty of the burgh, and also certain portions of the county of Lanark not within the ancient royalty. In 1863 the Magistrates and Town-Council of Rutherglen adopted the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, as applicable to the whole of the ancient royalty, and the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding and declaring that that Act applied to the whole royalty accordingly; but as the Act did not authorise its application to any part of the royalty which was outside the parliamentary burgh, the effect of these proceedings was to limit the application to that portion of the royalty which was within the parliamentary burgh.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

In this way, when the Burgh Police Act, 1892, was passed the police burgh of Rutherglen was coextensive neither with the ancient royalty nor with the parliamentary burgh, for it did not include that portion of the ancient royalty which was outside the parliamentary burgh, nor did it include those portions (designated area 1 and area 2 in the proceedings after narrated) of the parliamentary burgh which were outside the ancient royalty.

No. 80. On 22d January 1896 the Magistrates and Councillors of Rutherglen as such and as Commissioners under the Burgh Police Act, 1892, at a meeting duly called for the purpose, passed the following resolution under section 12 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892* :—"Resolved that the police boundary of the burgh be extended to the parliamentary boundary thereof for police purposes, including the right to vote for Commissioners, under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892."

White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

* The Burgh Police Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), enacts :—

Sec. 11.—"Upon the application of the Commissioners or of the council of any burgh, and after publication in the Edinburgh Gazette, and in any newspaper published in such burgh, and if no newspaper be published therein, then in a newspaper circulating in such burgh, and such other notice and inquiry as he may deem necessary, it shall be lawful for the Sheriff, after hearing all parties interested, from time to time to revise, alter, extend, or contract the boundaries of such burgh for the purposes of this Act, but so as not to encroach on the boundaries of any other burgh, and where not divided into wards to divide the same into wards, and where divided into wards to revise the boundaries of such wards; and where in any burgh wards exist at present, the Sheriff may increase their number or lessen their number by combination or rearrangement, and the Sheriff shall define, in a written deliverance on such application, the new boundaries of such burgh and wards, for the purposes of this Act; and such deliverance, unless appealed against, in manner hereinafter provided, shall be final; and when recorded along with the application on which it proceeds in the Sheriff Court books of the county, shall fix and determine the boundaries of such burgh and wards for the purposes of this Act. Where the burgh and the lands proposed to be included in any application for an extension of boundary lie in more than one county, the application shall be made to and disposed of by the Sheriffs of all the counties concerned. The Sheriff or Sheriffs in revising the boundaries of a burgh shall take into account the number of dwelling-houses within the area proposed to be included, the density of the population, and all the circumstances of the case, whether it properly belongs to and ought to form part of the burgh, and should in their judgment be included therein. In the event of the Sheriffs not being unanimous in opinion, the application shall not be granted, subject to an appeal as hereinafter provided."

Sec. 12.—"Where in any burgh the municipal boundary is either wholly or partly within the boundary for police purposes, it shall be lawful for the council at a meeting specially called for the purpose, of which a month's notice shall be given, to resolve that the boundary for municipal purposes, including the right to vote for town-councillors, shall be extended up to the boundary for police purposes, and to fix the boundary for municipal purposes accordingly, and where in any burgh the police boundary is wholly or partly within the municipal boundary or royalty or within the parliamentary boundary, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners at a meeting specially called for the purpose, of which a month's previous notice shall be given, to resolve to extend such police boundary to the municipal boundary or the royalty or the parliamentary boundary respectively for police purposes, including the right to vote for Commissioners, but so as not to encroach on the boundaries of any other burgh, and to fix the date, not being less than fourteen days from the date of the said resolution, when such resolution shall come into operation. Upon any such resolution being adopted, the council or the Commissioners of the burgh may present a petition to the Sheriff praying him to confirm the same; and the Sheriff after such intimation and service as he thinks proper, and after hearing all parties interested, shall dispose of the application, and upon any final judgment confirming the resolution being pronounced it shall be recorded in the Sheriff Court Books,

The effect of this resolution, if confirmed, would be to include area No. 80. 1 and area 2 within the police burgh.

Area 1, which extended to about 126 acres, lay at the north-west corner of the parliamentary burgh, and was entirely shut in by the existing police burgh of Rutherglen and by the city of Glasgow. Jan. 28, 1897.
White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

Area 2, extending to about 36 acres, lay at the north-east corner of the parliamentary burgh, and was shut in on three sides by the existing police burgh and by the city of Glasgow.

The magistrates and town-council having presented a petition to the Sheriff for confirmation of the foregoing resolution, objections were lodged (a) by Messrs John & James White, chemical manufacturers, Glasgow, and proprietors of works and other subjects in area 1; the trustees of William Dixon, ironmaster, also proprietors in area 1, and other similar proprietors or tenants; (b) by Messrs James Menzies & Company, iron tube manufacturers, and other proprietors or tenants in area 2; (c) by the County Council of Lanark; and (d) by the Landward Committee of Parish Council of Rutherglen.

The following statement (taken from the petition subsequently presented by the County Council to the Second Division for recall of the deliverance of the Sheriff) sufficiently shews the general nature of these objections:—"The areas Nos. 1 and 2 proposed to be included within the extended boundary are not adapted for such extension. They consist of fields or open ground, brickfields, and to a large extent of coalfields still unwrought, or in course of excavation, which render them unsuitable for building purposes. There are no large tenements, and such dwelling-houses as there are consist of a few rows of colliers' houses and one or two old mansion-houses (with ground attached) now either unoccupied or divided and let to several families. The population is small and not increasing, and neither of said areas is in and such resolution shall come into force from the date of such recording or such later date or dates as may be specified in the resolution; and any Act of Parliament conferring police jurisdiction or any other authority within such extended boundary shall, in so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of this section, be repealed."

Sec. 13.—"In any proceeding for fixing, altering, extending, contracting, or revising the boundaries of a burgh or populous place, or of the wards of a burgh, it shall be lawful for any owner or occupier within the boundaries as fixed by the Sheriff or Sheriffs who considers himself aggrieved by the deliverance of the Sheriff or Sheriffs, or the resolutions of the council or Commissioners, as the case may be, or for the county council or the standing joint committee of any county into which the said boundaries extend beyond the existing boundaries, within fourteen days from the date thereof, to present a petition against the deliverance of the Sheriff or Sheriffs to the Court of Session, setting forth the grounds on which they object to such deliverance; and the Court of Session may thereupon order answers, and, after answers have been lodged, may either pronounce a final order, or remit to a Lord Ordinary to direct inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and to issue such order thereupon as he may deem requisite to determine the boundaries of such burgh; and such order shall in either case be final, and when recorded in the Sheriff Court books of such county, shall fix and determine the boundaries of such burgh for the purposes of this Act. Where it is the duty of two or more Sheriffs to fix the boundary, and they cannot come to a unanimous decision, they shall state a case for the Court of Session, and the same procedure shall, with the necessary variations, be followed as hereinbefore prescribed in the case of the petition against the deliverance of the Sheriff."

No. 80. character a populous place within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. Thus in area No. 2 (apart from the tenements after mentioned, through which the proposed extended boundary will pass) there is only one house to each five acres. The total rental or annual value of the said two areas as at the date of the petition to the Sheriff is £11,430.

Jan. 28, 1897.
White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

"Area No. 1 is occupied by the Shawfield Chemical Works, four old mansion-houses, the mineral field of William Dixon, Limited, and some brickworks. The total rental or annual value of said area as at the date of the petition to the Sheriff is £6526.

"Area No. 2 extends to thirty-four acres, with a rental or annual value as at the date of the petition to the Sheriff of £4904. Three-fourths of the area are occupied by the Phoenix Tube Works of Messrs James Menzies & Company, with a rental or annual value of £1855, the Clydesdale Tube Works of Messrs James Eadie & Sons, with a rental or annual value of £1080, and the Clydesdale Dye Works of Messrs David Miller & Company, with a rental or annual value of £500. The total area occupied by said three works is twenty-four acres, and the total yearly rent or value thereof is £3435, or five-sevenths of the whole annual value of the area. On the said area No. 2 there are at present 154 small dwelling-houses, which, with the exception of six houses at the above-mentioned works, are all in tenements known as Farme Road, New Farme Place, Union Place, Smith Terrace, and Miller Terrace, and one-half of each of these three last-named tenements lies outside the proposed extended boundary, which would pass through the tenements near the middle thereof. The said tenements, so far as within said boundary, occupy three acres of ground. The remaining seven acres of area No. 2 are destitute of buildings, but upon them is constructed the Farme Railway, which is a single line worked by the Caledonian Railway Company, and running from their Dalmarnock branch railway to certain collieries.

"In 1878 the Magistrates of the burgh of Rutherglen, proceeding under the General Police Act, 1862, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, craving that the police boundaries of the burgh should be extended so as to include the area now proposed to be annexed, but after objections had been lodged and parties heard, the magistrates abandoned the petition. Since 1878 the area proposed to be annexed has not altered in character, and, if anything, there has been a decrease in the number of dwelling-houses.

"The said areas Nos. 1 and 2 will derive no benefit from inclusion within the burgh police boundary. They are at present policed by the county, in common with the burgh, which maintains no police force. They require no additional police force, and are unsuitable for police patrol, owing to the large area occupied by the before-mentioned works, within which there are a sufficient number of private watchmen. The said areas have at present a sufficient system of drainage and road management under the County Council administration, and an adequate supply of gas and water from the Corporation of the city of Glasgow; and the respondents cannot confer any benefit or make any improvement in regard to these matters. The respondents' only apparent motive in promoting the present extension is to acquire an additional area of taxation, irrespective of the suitability of the annexed area for inclusion in the police burgh."

The following special objection was also stated on behalf of Messrs White:—“The Messrs White, moreover, have at very considerable expenditure of time and money invented many methods in the way of the construction of furnaces, liquor-tanks, vitriol chambers, &c., and in the way of leading and utilising heat, which are secrets of the trade, and which they have expressly avoided patenting with the view of preserving such secrecy. If on these and similar occasions the warrant of the Dean of Guild Court had to be obtained, and plans and sections submitted before proceeding with the works involved, it would be impossible for the Messrs White to carry on their works, or at least a considerable number of the processes and operations now carried on in said works, within the area in question, thereby necessitating their removal to a locality free from such restrictions and interference.”

White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

On 23d October 1896 the Sheriff (Berry) pronounced the following deliverance:—“Having heard counsel for the parties, visited the district in question, and considered the whole process and productions, confirms the resolution of the Magistrates and Councillors of the Royal Burgh of Rutherglen, of date 22d January 1894, to the following effect:—‘That the police boundary of the burgh be extended to the parliamentary boundary thereof for police purposes, including the right to vote for commissioners under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.’” *

* “NOTE.— . . . No provision is contained in this section (sec. 12) to indicate the considerations which should weigh with the Sheriff in acting under it, and no reference is made to the particular considerations, viz., the number of dwelling-houses, and the density of the population, to which he is required to have regard in revising the boundaries of a burgh under the 11th section. The functions of the Sheriff in the two cases are different. In dealing with an application under the 11th section, it is open to him to grant it in part, and to refuse it in part. He is called upon himself to fix the proper boundaries, and has to exercise a discretion as to the limits to which the boundary should be extended, or it may be restricted. Under section 12 he has no such discretion, where, for example, as here, application is made by the commissioners of a burgh for confirmation of a resolution passed by them that the police boundary be extended to the parliamentary boundary, he must either grant or refuse the application altogether. He has no discretion in the way of adjusting a boundary as under section 11. In the present case there are two separate areas to which the resolution applies, referred to as areas 1 and 2 respectively, and it may be that the grounds for including one of these are stronger than those for including the other, but the two cannot be separated in disposing of the case. Both are required to bring the extension up to the parliamentary boundary, and confirmation must be granted as to both, if it is to be granted at all.

“It seems to me that the Act places the proceedings under the 11th and 12th sections on different footings, and it would have materially assisted the Sheriff in acting under section 12 if some indication had been given as to the considerations which should weigh with him in acting under it. It is contended for the objectors that he must, equally under section 12 as under section 11, take into account the particular considerations specified in the 11th section to which I have referred.

“If, however, that had been the intention of the Legislature, it might have been expected that, if not repeated in section 12, they would at all events have been referred to as set forth in section 11. We find that the language of section 11 on this subject is carefully repeated verbatim from

No. 80.

White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

The objectors then presented petitions under section 13 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, to the Second Division for recall of the Sheriff's deliverance.

Argued for the petitioners ;—The Sheriff was in error in supposing that he ought not to take into consideration, in applications under section 12, such elements as the density of the population and the number of the houses. He was bound to take into account all matters which might affect his judgment as to the propriety of the proposed extension. Had he done so, it was clear from his note that he would have been of opinion that area 1 at all events ought not to be included, and if he was right in holding that the resolution must be confirmed in toto or not at all, it followed that area 2 must be rejected also.

The parties then respectively interested in the two areas proceeded to argue the merits of the case as applicable to their particular area, on the assumption that the Sheriff was wrong in holding that the resolution could not competently be in part confirmed and in part rejected.

section 9, where it is used for the guidance of the Sheriff in proceedings for the original formation of a burgh. Why, if it had been intended that the same considerations should govern an application under section 12, should a similar repetition of the language, or at least a reference to it, have been omitted? Further, if the same considerations were to apply equally to a confirmation by the Sheriff of a resolution of the magistrates under section 12 as to an application for a revision of the boundaries under section 11, it is difficult to see any necessity for such an enactment as we find in section 12. Without any such enactment, it would be competent for the commissioners of a burgh to apply, under section 11, for an extension to the parliamentary boundary, and in dealing with such an application the Sheriff, while he would be vested with all the discretion given to him by that section as to the proper limits of extension, would, on the other hand, be bound to have careful regard to the particular considerations specified in the section. I am induced to think that in regard to the question whether or not effect should be given to a resolution of the commissioners of a burgh under section 12, such special considerations as the number of dwelling-houses, and the density of the population are not to be treated as of the same importance as they would be were the proceedings under section 11. On the other hand, I am not prepared to accept the argument of the burgh authorities, that in acting under section 12 the functions of the Sheriff are purely ministerial. The language of the statute is not consistent with such a view. It seems to me that the case must be governed by considerations of general expediency, regard being had to the manifest intention of the Legislature, that an extension of the police to the parliamentary boundary should be dealt with in a different way, and treated on a distinct footing from a revision of the boundaries under section 11.

"In dealing with the present case, I think some weight may fairly be given to the fact that we have a unanimous resolution on the part of the magistrates and council, that the police boundary should be extended to the parliamentary boundary. Apart, however, from such weight as may be due to that consideration, I am of opinion that the extension on which the burgh authorities have resolved has reasonable grounds to support it. With regard to area No. 1, it is averred by the objectors on record, and it is not denied, that 'it consists to a large extent of coalfields still unwrought, or in course of excavation, which renders it unsuitable for building purposes.' To what extent the minerals may be still unwrought I am not aware. No inquiry was asked under this head, and on the part of Messrs

At the hearing it was mooted on the bench whether, in the event of it being held that the Sheriff had not taken into consideration all the circumstances which under the Act he ought to have considered, the case ought not to be remitted to the Sheriff on the ground that he had not exercised his jurisdiction under the Act, but a majority of the Court doubted the propriety of that course, looking to the terms of section 13 of the Act.

White v.
Magistrates of

At advising on 11th December 1896,—

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Sheriff in thinking that in the present case he was precluded by the terms of the 12th section of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, from confirming the resolution of the magistrates in part, or from confirming it under conditions. I think the clause of the statute referred to gives the Sheriff the alternative of confirming the resolution or refusing to confirm it, but gives him no power to adopt another or a middle course. It is only upon a final judgment “confirming the resolution,”—that is, the resolution of the magistrates as presented to the Sheriff for confirmation,—

Dixon and other objectors, on whose behalf the averment is made, it was stated, when I asked if inquiry was wished, that the admission on record was considered sufficient. But however unsuitable for building purposes a portion of area No. 1 may be at present, we have on that area large and important industrial works, and in particular those of Messrs White, chemical manufacturers, who are among the opponents of the petition. These works, although not at present within the police boundary, are within the parliamentary boundary, and in close proximity to the burgh, which has a large and increasing residential population. It appears from the statements of these objectors, that ‘changes and renewals of buildings within chemical works are frequently necessary,’ although they say that these ‘in no way affect the public, and need no Dean of Guild supervision.’ The petitioners, on the other hand, rely on the importance of a power of supervision on the part of a Dean of Guild Court under the Act in support of their case; and I think that in that view they are right. There may also be other advantages in the possession by burgh authorities of a certain right of interference with large industrial works in their immediate vicinity, with the view, for example, of preventing or lessening possible nuisances to the inhabitants. It is suggested that the action of the Burgh Commissioners is prompted solely by a desire to profit by the inclusion within their area of valuable rateable subjects. That is denied by them, and, although no doubt the proprietors of the subjects in question would prefer to remain free from liability to the burgh rates, it must be kept in view that by section 373 (3) of the Act, the Commissioners are empowered to grant exemption or restriction of assessment in favour of any portion of the burgh where sufficient reason exists for such a course. It may be expected that the Commissioners will exercise the power so given to them in a spirit of equity.

“What I have said as to the importance of a certain power of control over buildings and works situated on the outskirts of the present police burgh has a bearing on the case in relation not only to area No. 1, but also to area No. 2. On that area there are various industrial works, and at the date of my visit to the locality additional works were in course of being erected. Besides works, there are on area No. 2 a considerable number of dwelling-houses; and in my judgment this area (to borrow the language of section 11) properly belongs to, and ought to form part of, the burgh, and should be included therein. It is unfortunate that the parliamentary boundary intersects certain tenements of houses on this area, and is not therefore such a boundary as one would have fixed had the boundary been open for adjustment. But such an awkwardness of boundary does not affect being recorded in the Sheriff Court books that "such resolution" comes into force. To confirm it in part or under conditions would not be confirming the resolution agreed to and made by the magistrates; it would be confirmation of something other than had been resolved upon. The Sheriff was therefore right, in my opinion, in saying that the two areas in question comprehended and dealt with in the one resolution must be kept together so far as his judgment was concerned—that he could not, as the case was presented to him under section 12, confirm the resolution quoad the one, and refuse to confirm the resolution quoad the other.

But dealing with the resolution as a whole, the Sheriff is directed to hear the parties interested, and thereupon to dispose of the case. Now, to hear all parties interested involves that the parties interested shall be entitled to state every consideration which they think has a bearing upon the matter to be decided, and that every such consideration shall be duly weighed by the Sheriff. The effect to be given to such consideration lies with him, at all events in the first place, but there are no considerations of the nature I have alluded to which he may not take into account and give such effect to as he may think them entitled to. On the contrary, I think the Sheriff, in the discharge of his duty, not only may, but must, consider all reasonable grounds of objection to the confirmation of the magistrates' resolution stated for his consideration by parties interested. But I gather from what the Sheriff says in the note to his interlocutor that he has not done so. He thinks that the density of population and the number of dwelling-houses within the area which he is directed to take into account in any proceeding under section 11 are not to be taken into account in dealing with a magistrates' resolution under section 12; at all events, that they are "not to be treated as of the same importance as they would be were the proceedings under section 11." I cannot judge of their exact importance, but I think they should certainly be taken into account if in the Sheriff's judgment they have any bearing upon the application before him. So far as I can judge, these considerations are very far from being irrelevant, and should be taken account of. The Sheriff evidently thinks that the case presented to him was stronger for the confirmation of the resolution in reference to area No. 2 than in reference to area No. 1. He says the circumstances of area No. 1, if considered apart from area No. 2, might the question whether the area within it ought to be included in the burgh, as in my opinion it ought to be. If this area No. 2 is included, it is impossible to leave out area No. 1, the circumstances of which, if considered by itself, might give rise to greater question.

"The fortunes of the two areas are indissolubly bound up together.

"I have been pressed with the argument that the bulk of the residents in the district proposed to be annexed are opposed to the application. Their objections are founded mainly in apprehensions of increased rating; but these are not, in my opinion, sufficient to overcome other considerations of expediency and convenience of administration. I have already referred to the power of granting exemption or a restriction of assessment possessed by the Commissioners under the Act. The special provision contained in section 12 points to the conclusion that an assimilation of the police to the parliamentary boundary is regarded by the Legislature as in itself generally expedient, and after consideration, I think that in the present case the circumstances are sufficient to justify it. . . ."

“give rise to greater question,” but that their fortunes are “indissolubly bound up together.” But there is no reason why the one case should give place to the other. If the case for confirmation is made out as regards area No. 2, but not as regards area No. 1, the result will be that the resolution will not be confirmed; the two being bound together, if confirmation cannot be given of all, then the part that would be confirmed, if standing alone, must follow the fortune of that part confirmation of which cannot be given.

White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

The interests involved in this case are represented by the respondents as being very momentous. I can believe that this is no exaggeration, and being of opinion that the Sheriff has not given full weight to all the considerations that were presented to him—being of opinion that to some extent these were not open for his consideration—I think the interests of all concerned require that we should hear the case further, and give the parties an opportunity of stating to us any grounds upon which they think the resolutions of the magistrates should not be confirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think that it is clear that the Sheriff in arriving at his decision has taken into consideration all the facts necessary in connection with this petition. I therefore concur in the Court hearing further statement and argument with reference to the interests here involved, and which very properly require to be taken into consideration. Thus there are here manufacturers upon a large scale who have set down works outside the municipal area, and we can understand manufacturers of this description and on this scale objecting, because it might be very serious to them, and possibly detrimental to their interests, to bring these localities within the municipality. Then, again, it might be shewn that municipal expenses were considerably increased by the very fact that these manufactories were in the immediate vicinity of the burgh. I take it to be clear enough that the real desire on the part of the municipal authorities was to bring these areas within the bounds of the municipality in order that the municipal taxes might be extended thereto. These were all matters upon which, in the legitimate interests of all concerned, we might hear further argument and any statements in fact which might bear on these questions.

LORD MONCREIFF.—But for one consideration I should not have been disposed to interfere with the deliverance of the Sheriff. I think that he has, with one possible exception, taken a correct view of his duties in a proceeding under the 12th section of the Burgh Police Act, 1892. He is the most suitable person to make the necessary inquiry, and decide as to the extension of the police boundaries of the burgh to the parliamentary boundaries thereof for police purposes, and his decision on the merits is not to be lightly set aside.

But in a proceeding under the 12th section I think it is the duty of the Sheriff to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case. Amongst these I think he is bound to consider the number of dwelling-houses and the density of the population in the area between the police boundaries and the parliamentary boundaries to which it is sought to extend them, not because these matters are mentioned in the 11th section and imported by implication into the 12th section, but because they are material matters to be considered in any question as to the extension of boundaries.

No. 80.

Jan. 28, 1897.
White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

What weight and effect is to be given to the density of the population and the number of the dwelling-houses is another matter. As at present advised, I am disposed to think that in deciding as to extension of boundaries under the 12th section, less weight may be given to the number or paucity of dwelling-houses and population than in deciding as to a revision of the boundaries under the 11th section. The object of the 12th section is to square the burgh boundaries, e.g., to make the municipal boundary coincide with the police boundary, or the police boundaries with the parliamentary boundaries, and the extension of boundaries under that section is only competent if they are extended as a whole to the outer boundaries which have already been fixed for certain purposes connected with the burgh. It may often happen that part of the intermediate area is so sparsely populated that had the question been one of revision of boundaries under the 11th section the Sheriff might not have been entitled or bound to include that part in the extension. But it would greatly hinder the operation of the 12th section if the same considerations applied with equal force to proceedings under the two sections. While they would merely limit extension in the one case, they might wholly prevent it in the other.

But in the present case the Sheriff's note leaves some doubt as to whether he has taken into consideration at all the number of dwelling-houses and the density of population in the area in question. I think that probably he did; there are passages in his opinion which indicate as much, but the matter is left in doubt. Personally I should have preferred, had that course been considered open to us, to have remitted to the Sheriff, not for the purpose of holding any fresh inquiry, but simply to ascertain whether he did or did not consider those matters. But as there may be objections to adopting this course, I agree that parties should be further heard before ourselves.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

The case was then restored to the roll, and was thereafter put out for further hearing, and the parties were further heard.

There was no proof.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the Sheriff in thinking that the resolution must be confirmed as a whole, or must be set aside altogether. But I am of opinion, taking into consideration the circumstances stated in connection with the two areas in question, that this resolution to annex them cannot be confirmed.

There is a great deal to be said for annexation of certain parts of one of the areas, or even the whole of one of the areas, but the whole resolution cannot be confirmed, as there are large parts of the districts as to which there is no prospect of conversion into burghal subjects. There are mineral districts which would make building hazardous, and in point of fact, buildings had been decreasing and the rental had been diminishing for a considerable time. I therefore see no sufficient ground for including the whole of the areas, and I am therefore of opinion that the resolution should not be confirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—The duty which the Court has to discharge is one which, No. 80.
I think fortunately, rarely presents itself. I agree with your Lordship that the reasons given for preserving things as they have been hitherto should prevail. In that view I do not think it expedient to enter into details.

Jan. 28, 1897.
White v.
Magistrates of Rutherglen.

LORD TRAYNER.—On careful consideration of the arguments presented to us for the several parties, I have come to be of opinion that there is no sufficient ground for confirming the resolution complained of, while very strong and sufficient reasons to the contrary have been stated. I think the interlocutor of the Sheriff petitioned against should be recalled, and confirmation of the resolution refused.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree that the considerations in favour of the extension of the boundaries of the burgh of Rutherglen are not sufficient to counterbalance those against the extension.

The application is made under the 12th section of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. Under that section the boundaries must be extended as a whole, or not at all. I think it is quite a fair observation that unless that power of extension is to remain a dead letter we cannot apply such a strict test as to density of population and number of dwelling-houses as is required under the 11th section of the statute, when it is proposed to make a partial extension of the municipal boundaries. In an application under the 12th section some of the areas which it is proposed to include may be more sparsely populated than others, and taken by themselves might not justify an extension. But if the other areas proposed to be included were suitable for that purpose, the character of the sparsely populated areas might be disregarded.

In each case, therefore, it is necessary to balance the considerations which affect the different areas which it is proposed to include, and in particular the proportions in extent which those which are suitable bear to those which are not.

In the present case if area No. 2, which contains 36 acres, were alone to be considered, there might perhaps be sufficient grounds for including it within the municipal boundaries; and if it is hereafter thought desirable to do so, this may still be done under the 11th section of the statute. But No. 1 contains 126 acres, and is thus nearly four times the size of No. 2. It is not urban in character; the residences and population are few; and a great part of the ground is, at present at least, unfitted for building owing to mineral workings. I do not attach much weight, taken by themselves, to the objections made by the manufacturers whose works stand on No. 1, on the ground that the proposed extension will interfere with them in the management of their works. But, taken as a whole, I think that that area is not suitable for inclusion, and that the considerations arising from its size and character so much counterbalance the reasons for extension afforded by No. 2, that the application made to us under the 12th section of the statute should be refused.

LORD YOUNG.—I wish to avoid saying anything that would give any encouragement to the Town-Council to make another resolution applicable to one of the areas. I desire to express no opinion upon that point.

Marriage-Contract—Construction—Whether grandchildren could claim as "issue" of the marriage—Renunciation of liferent—Alimentary Provision.—An antenuptial marriage-contract directed the trustees on the death of the wife to pay to the husband the free income of the residue of her estates, during his life, "for his own use and for the maintenance and education of the issue (if such there be) of the intended marriage," and to hold the capital "for behoof of the whole children of the said intended marriage, in such proportions and under such conditions as" the spouses or the survivor might appoint; and failing such appointment, "for behoof of her whole lawful children and the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike, the issue of any of them predeceasing her succeeding to their parent's share in equal proportions.

The wife died without making any appointment, survived by four children and her husband, who subsequently executed a deed by which the estate was divided equally among the children. In accordance with this deed, the husband, who was willing to renounce his liferent, and the children who were all major, and three of whom were married with issue, required the trustees to distribute the estate, but they refused to do so on the ground that the husband's liferent might be alimentary, and that the grandchildren might have an interest in the estate.

In a special case, held (1) that the words "issue of the marriage," as used in the clause in question, applied exclusively to the children, and did not include grandchildren; (2) that the husband was entitled to renounce his liferent; and (3) that the trustees were bound on production of a discharge by the children, and a renunciation of his liferent by the husband, to divide the trust-estate among the children in the proportions specified in the deed of appointment.

2D DIVISION. CHARLES EDWARD M'MURDO, lieutenant, and afterwards captain, in the 79th Regiment of Highlanders, and Miss Madeline Susan Baxter, entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage in 1861, by which Miss Baxter conveyed her whole estate to trustees.

The fifth purpose was in the following terms :—" In the event of her predeceasing her said intended husband, they shall pay to him the free interest or income for the time being of the residue of her estates foresaid during all the days of his life, for his own use and for the maintenance and education of the issue (if such there be) of the said intended marriage; and the said trustees shall hold and apply the fee or capital of the residue of the said estates and income arising therefrom after his death, for behoof of the whole children of the said intended marriage, in such proportions and under such conditions as the said Madeline Susan Baxter and Charles Edward M'Murdo may appoint in any writing to be executed by them during their joint lives, or if no such writing be executed by them jointly, then by any writing to be executed by the survivor of them; and failing such writings, for behoof of her whole lawful children and the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike, the issue of any of them predeceasing her succeeding to their parent's share in equal proportions." No. 81.

M'Murdo's Trustees v. M'Murdo.

Mrs M'Murdo died in 1869, survived by her husband and by four children, and leaving estate to the amount of £10,827, 8s. 1d., without having executed the power of appointment. In 1883 Captain M'Murdo, by deed directed the trust-estate to be divided equally among the children, and "in case of the death of any of my said children before receiving payment of the sum apportioned to each as aforesaid without issue, then and in that case I direct and appoint the said trustees to make payment of the share or shares destined to the child or children so dying without issue to the survivors of my said children equally among such survivors."

In 1896 Captain M'Murdo and the four children of the marriage requested the trustees to divide the estate in terms of the deed of appointment. Captain M'Murdo agreed to renounce his liferent and join in the discharge to the trustees. Three of the children were married, and had children who were all in pupilarity.

The trustees contended that they could not competently divide the estate during the life of Captain M'Murdo.

Accordingly a special case was presented by (1) the marriage-contract trustees; (2) Captain M'Murdo; (3) the children of the marriage; and (4) the issue of the children, for the opinion of the Court on the following question of law:—"Whether the first parties are bound, on receiving a renunciation from the second party of his liferent and a discharge by the third parties, to wind up the trust-estate under their charge, and divide the funds in their hands among the said third parties in the proportions specified in the said deed of appointment?"

The first and fourth parties argued;—(1) The marriage-contract directed the income to be applied to maintenance of the "issue." "Issue" included grandchildren.¹ The contract plainly used it in this sense. The word occurred twice. The second occasion applied to grandchildren, and it was natural to suppose that the first occasion was as comprehensive in its application. The fourth parties had thus an indefeasible interest in the estate. (2) Captain M'Murdo had the use of the income "during all the days of his life," and thus the provision for him was alimentary in character, and must be retained.²

The second and third parties argued;—"Issue" meant children of the marriage, and grandchildren were only conditionally instituted on the predecease of Mrs M'Murdo by her children. Captain M'Murdo

 Jan. 28, 1897. At advising,— M'Murdo's
 Trustees v.
 M'Murdo.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late Mrs M'Murdo, by antenuptial contract, disposed her estate, present and prospective, to trustees, and appointed that in the event of her predeceasing her husband they were to pay to him the interest or income during his life, "for his own use and for the maintenance and education of the issue" of the marriage, and to hold the fee and income after his death for the children, in such proportions and under such conditions as the spouses or the survivor of them might appoint in writing, and failing such writing, for all the children and the survivors, the issue of any predeceasing child taking the parent's share.

Mrs M'Murdo is now dead, being survived by her husband and all her children, and her husband has executed a deed of appointment, by which the estate is to be divided equally among the children, the share of any child dying without issue before division to be divided equally among the survivors.

The question now before the Court is, whether the trustees may now divide the fund among the children of the marriage. All the children are major, and desire that this should be done, and the father, who is also desirous to the same effect, has agreed to renounce all rights he may have to the liferent or income settled upon him.

When the purposes of the trust are looked at, it is seen that there is here a provision for the support of the other spouse and the upbringing of the family. There is no express declaration of an alimentary character attaching to the provision, and there is nothing from which such an intention is to be implied. The purpose is stated as one "for his own use and the maintenance and education of the issue." This latter part of the purpose has been fulfilled so far as upbringing and education are concerned, as the family are all grown up. There therefore remains only as regards the purposes that which applies to the payment of interest to the survivor of the spouses. There is really no question as regards issue of children, for there is in the deed no destination over. It is only the issue of any child "predeceasing her" that are to take the parent's share, and she was survived by all her children.

In this case the children of the marriage have a right of fee, and it is only the father's right to a liferent interest which stands in the way of their shares being made over to them. I think that he can discharge his claim, and that if he does so the trustees are entitled to wind up the trust and to hand over their shares to the beneficiaries.

LORD YOUNG.—I assume from the manner in which the trustees express their views that the request of the beneficiaries for the immediate distribution of the estate appears to them to be quite reasonable, and that in their opinion the purpose of the deceased will not be defeated by such distribution. I therefore concur in answering the question as suggested.

 might, by conveyancers bringing the matter under the notice of the granter M'Murdo's of such deeds, and seeing that the words of the deed clearly express the Trustees v.
 granter's intention. M'Murdo.

LORD TRAYNER.—By the antenuptial contract now under consideration it was provided that on the death of Mrs M'Murdo (which has happened) the marriage-contract trustees should pay the free interest or income of the residue of her estates to her surviving husband "during all the days of his life" for his own use, and for the maintenance and education of "the issue of the marriage," and should hold the fee or capital of such estates for behoof of "the whole children of the said intended marriage," in such proportion as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint. Failing such appointment, the estates were to be held "for behoof of her whole lawful children" and the survivors, share and share alike. It was suggested, if not maintained, on behalf of the first and fourth parties to this case, that some right was conferred (after the death of Mrs M'Murdo) on the fourth parties (her grandchildren) in the interest or income of the estates by the words "issue of the marriage." I do not doubt that in many cases the terms "issue of the marriage" would include grandchildren. But I do not think they do so here. The expression "issue of the marriage" occurs in the same clauses with the expression "children of the said intended marriage" and "whole lawful children," and I think it impossible to read the whole clause without coming to the conclusion that its provisions were intended to apply, and only to apply, to the immediate issue of the marriage,—that is, to the children of Mr and Mrs M'Murdo.

Mrs M'Murdo having died, the only persons interested in the estate in question are Mr M'Murdo, who has right to the liferent, and the children of the marriage, who take the fee, subject to their father's right of appointment. The children are all of full age, and their rights are vested.

In these circumstances Mr M'Murdo offers to renounce and discharge his liferent in order that his children may at once receive their shares of the estate as he has apportioned them; but the question has been raised whether Mr M'Murdo can validly discharge his liferent. I am of opinion that he can, and the case of *Pretty v. Newbigging*¹ seems a direct authority in favour of that view. I may also refer to the opinion of Lord Watson in the case of *Muirhead*² as applicable to the present case, where the construction and continuance of the trust have apparently no other purpose or object (and none other was suggested at the bar) than the protection and security of the liferent right which Mr M'Murdo is ready to discharge.

I think therefore that the question put to us should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

 MRS MARY CRAIG OR HARVEY AND OTHERS (Mrs Mary Taylor or Craig's Representatives), Defenders (Respondents).—W. Campbell—M'Clure.

Executor—Settlement of action by majority of executors—Title of non-consenting executor to continue action.—Where an action on behalf of an executry estate had been raised by the executors, six in number, and the case had been settled by joint minute for five executors without the consent of the sixth, and decree of absolvitor pronounced, held that the executor who did not consent to the settlement had no title to continue the action, no unfairness on the part of the other executors being alleged.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Power to compromise conflicting claims on ward's estate.—Opinion by Lord Kincairney that a curator bonis has power at common law to compromise claims relating to the ward's moveable estate.

Trust—Trustee—Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Power of curator bonis to compromise claims on ward's estate—Statute—Retrospective operation—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 2—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63), sec. 2.—The Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 2, enacted that trustees should have the power, where it is not at variance with the trust purposes, "5 to compromise . . . all claims connected with the trust-estate."

The Trusts Amendment Act, 1884, sec. 2, enacted,—"In the construction of the said recited Acts,"—one of these being the Trusts Act, 1867,—"'trustee' shall include tutor, curator, and judicial factor," and "judicial factor shall mean curator bonis."

Opinion (per Lord Kincairney) that this latter provision was declaratory, and therefore retrospective in its effects.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Kin-
 cairney.

ON 28th June 1872 James Wink, accountant, Glasgow, was appointed curator bonis to Alexander Taylor junior, shipmaster, who had become insane, and was then in Gartnavel Asylum. The ward's property had been managed for many years by his mother, Mrs Janet Fraser or Taylor, who died in July 1872. The curator bonis then called upon her executors, Mrs Mary Taylor or Craig and others, to account for her intromissions with the rents of her son's property. The executors made a large claim for meliorations executed by Mrs Taylor, and Mrs Craig, as an individual, claimed repayment of a loan of £600 which she had made to the ward.

In July 1873 an agreement was executed by Mrs Elizabeth Taylor, the ward's wife, on the one part, Mrs Craig and Mrs Scott, the ward's sisters, and Ebenezer, the ward's only surviving brother, on the other part, whereby, on the narrative that the curator had agreed, on receiving discharges of the claims against him, to renounce all claims against the executors of the ward's mother, and that the parties to the agreement were the only parties interested at present or prospectively in the ward's estate, they agreed to a certain arrangement.

By an agreement, dated 25th September and 4th October 1873, between the curator bonis and Mrs Craig, Mrs Craig gave up her claim for £600, and the curator gave up all claims against Mrs Janet Fraser or Taylor's representatives, and Mrs Craig, as taking burden on herself for these representatives, gave up all claims against the ward's estate.

Mrs Scott died in May 1888, Ebenezer Taylor died in 1892, and the ward died insane on 14th November 1893.

It was then discovered that he had left a will dated 15th November 1866 leaving his whole property to Mrs Scott, and a codicil dated 17th November 1880 to the same effect, but adding a conveyance in favour of Mrs Scott's children nominatim, to take effect in the event of Mrs Scott predeceasing him, and nominating them his executors.

Scott v.
Craig's Representatives.

On 14th February 1894 James Edward Scott, shipowner, London, and his five brothers and sisters, as executors-nominate of Alexander Taylor, their uncle, and as individuals, raised an action against Mrs Craig and her daughter Mrs Harvey, the surviving executors of Mrs Janet Fraser or Taylor, mother of the ward, and against James Wink, the curator bonis of the lunatic.

The conclusions of the summons were (1) for reduction of the agreement dated 25th September and 4th October 1873 between the defender Wink, as curator bonis of the lunatic, Alexander Taylor, and Mrs Craig, as representing Mrs Taylor, then deceased; (2) for an account of Mrs Taylor's intromissions with the estate of her son Alexander; and (3) for decree for £14,000 failing accounting.

The pursuers averred,—(Cond. 13) "At the time that said agreement (the agreement dated 25th September and 4th October 1873 under reduction) was entered into, it was apparently contemplated that the parties thereto were the only parties who would be interested in the succession of the ward on his death. Acting on this assumption, which was entirely erroneous, Mr Wink made no independent inquiry of any kind as to the nature or extent of the claims which he could enforce against Mrs Taylor's representatives, and he did not obtain the authority of the Court to the compromise in question. He acted upon the footing that whatever might be the sums due to his ward by the representatives of old Mrs Taylor, it was useless to inquire into same, if the whole parties who were interested in the ward's succession settled the question of accounting amongst themselves. This was entirely erroneous in fact,—neither the ward nor the parties interested in or entitled to his succession having come to any such agreement or settlement, or even considered the subject, or been consulted thereon. Prior to the date of the agreements in question, the ward had executed a will leaving his whole estate to Mrs Scott, whom failing, by predecease, to her children, the pursuers, and they accordingly are the only persons interested in his succession." (Cond. 14) "The agreement under reduction was executed in essential error, as above set forth, on the part of the whole parties thereto. It was of the nature of a compromise on the erroneous footing that all parties interested then or prospectively were agreed. It was not, and was not meant to be, binding upon the ward himself, or others deriving right through him. In point of fact, his and their rights and interests were entirely ignored, and the same have been prejudiced, and loss thereby caused to the extent of the sum sued for. It was ultra vires of the said James Wink or the other parties to said agreements to prejudice the rights of the pursuers by said deeds, and the same are not in any way binding on the pursuers."

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The said agreement falls to be reduced in respect (1) that it was granted under mutual and essential error; (2) that it was ultra vires of the curator bonis, James Wink; et (3) separatim, it is not binding on the pursuers and forms no bar to an accounting.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (3) The averments of

No. 82. the pursuers being irrelevant, the action should be dismissed. 4. The pursuers are barred from suing the present action in respect that the curator bonis compromised the present claim.

Jan. 29, 1897. Scott v. Craig's Representatives. On 6th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary held the production satisfied, and the defences already lodged as defences on the merits, and on 20th March the record was closed.

On 17th January 1895 a joint minute was lodged, which bore that the "pursuers other than the said James Edward Scott" concurred with the defenders in stating that they had come to an extrajudicial arrangement regarding the matters set forth upon record, and in respect of it they craved "the Lord Ordinary, as between these parties, to assolzie the whole defenders from the conclusions of the summons."

On 19th January 1895 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect and in terms of the joint minute for the pursuers other than the pursuer James Edward Scott, and for the defenders, assolzie the whole defenders from the conclusions of the summons."

On 21st February 1896 a minute of wakening and transference was lodged by James Edward Scott, which prayed for transference of the cause to the representatives of Mrs Craig, who in the interval had died.

This minute was objected to by Mrs Harvey and the other representatives of Mrs Craig, on the ground that it was incompetent unless with the concurrence of James Edward Scott's co-executors, and accordingly on 10th March by the interlocutor by which the process was wakened and transferred as craved, all questions as to the pursuer's title were expressly reserved.

On 1st December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer James Edward Scott has no title to sue this action: Sustains the defenders' plea to that effect: Dismisses the action."*

* "OPINION.— . . . Parties have been heard on title and the grounds of action, and the first question necessarily is whether the objection to title should be sustained.

"With very considerable hesitation I have come to the conclusion that it should. James Edward Scott, the sole pursuer, is one of several executors and one of several beneficiaries under the will of Alexander Taylor, and it is, I think, clear that he does not, either as executor (being only one of many, and none of them confirmed) or as beneficiary, represent Alexander Taylor. In the ordinary case a minority of executors cannot sue a debtor of the defunct—See Morton v. The Duke, 11th April 1557, M. 14,686; Borthwick v. Douglas, 1st February 1566, M. 14,685; v. Lag, 8th March 1634, M. 14,689; Bryson v. Torrance, 24th November 1841, 4 D. 71, 14 Scot. Jur. 30, per Lord Medwyn. It has also been settled, in a great variety of circumstances, that no creditor or legatee of a defunct can sue the debtor of the defunct—Bryson v. Torrance, supra; Addison v. Whyte, 25th June 1870, 8 Macph. 909, 42 Scot. Jur. 483; Hinton v. Connell's Trustees, 6th July 1883, 10 R. 1110; Rae v. Meek, 20th July 1888, 15 R. 1033; Henderson v. Robb, 18th January 1889, 16 R. 341.

"But exceptions have been admitted to both of these rules. In Bryson v. Torrance, the title of one out of three executors was sustained in an action against another of the executors as a debtor to the estate, in which the other executors had refused to concur; and in Watt v. Roger's Trustees, 18th July 1890, 17 R. 1201, an action by a beneficiary under a trust for recovery, for

James Edward Scott reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The action was relevant. The ground of reduction was essential error, consisting in the fact that the curator bonis on the one hand and Mrs Taylor's representatives on the other entered into the agreement under the erroneous belief that the defenders were the sole prospective inheritors of the ward's estate. A judicial factor charged with the administration of an estate had a duty to consider the interests of the estate, and only to enter into transactions affecting it after full consideration. Here the averment was that he had failed in this duty and had never really applied his mind to the agreement. Confronted by those whom he imagined to be the sole representatives having any interest in his ward's estate, he had practically told them to arrange matters amongst themselves, and that he would endorse their settlement. He had totally ignored the possibility of the ward's recovering his sanity and making a new will. It was not necessary that such a case should be suggested by anything in gremio of the agreement. It was enough if the pursuer averred that by the transaction the curator bonis had surrendered through error a valuable asset of the estate to those

 Scott v.
 Craig's Repre-

the benefit of the trust-estate, of a debt by one of the trustees, where it was said that the other trustees were acting in concert with the defender, was sustained.

"The pursuer James Edward Scott, admitting the general rule, contended that this case falls under either or both of the exceptions so recognised, and that his executorial title is sufficient on the authority of Bryson v. Torrance, and his title as beneficiary sufficient under the authority of Watt v. Roger's Trustees; and, if there had been nothing against the pursuer's title, except that the pursuer was only one of several executors and beneficiaries, I think I should hardly have been able to sustain the objection to it. The lapse of time might create much difficulty, but still there is no plea of mora against the pursuer, the action having been brought without any delay; and it might have been possible for him, if he had good grounds for setting aside the contract, to have ascertained the balance, if any, which would in that case be due from the estate of Mrs Taylor to the estate of Alexander Taylor; and he might perhaps have restricted his demand to the share of the balance which he might be able to vindicate for himself.

"But then over and above all this, there has been a transaction by which decree of absolvitor in favour of the defenders has been pronounced against five of the executors. The action by them has not been dismissed. It has been decided against them, although no doubt by agreement. I think the case is the same as if these five executors had ratified the agreement, and that without fraud or any conduct which has been described as unfair. No doubt they did not intend to affect the pursuer's title; but the defenders did not agree that the pursuer's title should not be affected, and they are not barred from objecting to it. If then five out of six executors agree to ratify an agreement which has been challenged, has a single remaining executor a title to ignore that ratification and to set aside that agreement? I must admit that I cannot give a confident answer to that question, and I answer it with hesitation in the negative.

"The law as to the powers of a majority of executors is not very clearly settled, but latterly the view that executors act like trustees by a majority has, I think, been preferred. The earlier cases of Grant and Gregory v. Campbell's Representatives, 11th July 1764, M. 14,690, and Rogerson v. Barker, 9th March 1833, 11 S. and D. 563, 5 Scot. Jur. 273, and the more recent case of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, 3d February 1886, 13 R. 507, favour that view, and I think it is supported by Lord M'Laren on Wills, 2d ed. vol. ii. 902. On these grounds I lean to the opinion that the purwho had no title to it. The error was "of the substance of the matter,"¹ and the agreement was reducible. (2) The reclaimer had a good title to continue the pursuit of the action. The action was raised by the pursuers individually as well as qua executors, and the reclaimer was therefore entitled to pursue the action notwithstanding that his co-executors had retired from it. One executor could not discharge a debt wholly "seeing the other executors had equal share in all."² When the majority of the executors retired from the action they did not intend to prejudice the reclaimer's right to go on with it if he chose. It had never been held that a majority of executors was entitled to compromise an action begun by the entire body of executors, and none of the cases cited by the respondents were in point. In Coulter v. Forrester,³ the deed expressly directed that two trustees should be a quorum, and two of them settled the action with the debtor. In Grant v. Campbell's Representatives,⁴ of the three executors appointed in the deed two only had been confirmed, and they settled the action.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The action was irrelevant. The suer has no title to sue this action on this record. Whether he can frame a better action against the defenders, or whether he has any remedy against his co-executors, I do not venture to say.

"This ground of judgment necessarily disposes of the action, and precludes disposal by judgment of the plea of irrelevancy and of the grounds of reduction, and if I were more confident about it than I am, I might go no further. But, as the grounds of reduction pleaded were fully argued, I think it may be more satisfactory that I should proceed briefly to notice them. I do so as if the whole executors were still insisting.

"Now, the agreement bears to be of the nature of a compromise. It was not a mere discharge, it was a settlement of conflicting claims, and the first question seems to be whether it was intra vires of the curator bonis. I am disposed to think that it was, especially as it related only to personal estate, and did not affect the ward's heritable property. It must be admitted that the powers of a curator bonis at common law to effect a compromise without judicial authority are not well cleared by decisions. Such a power has, however, been recognised to a certain extent. Thus, in Anderson, 7th March 1855, 17 D. 596, 27 Scot. Jur. 258, the Court refused a petition by a judicial factor for special power to compromise, on the ground that such powers were unnecessary. In Thomson's Trustees v. Muir, 13th December 1867, 6 Macph. 145, a distinction was taken between the power of trustees to compromise and their power to enter into a submission; and while it was held that a submission into which trustees had entered was beyond their power, the judgment might have been different had the case regarded a compromise by the trustees. It appeared to be thought that a power in trustees to compromise would be more readily recognised than a power to refer, and the case of Anderson was referred to without disapproval. Yet in the case of Corson, 10th July 1835, 13 S. and D. 1093, 7 Scot. Jur. 501, a petition by a curator bonis for power to enter into a submission regarding the moveable effects of an imbecile party was refused as unnecessary, because within the discretion of the curator bonis. If a power to enter into a submission about moveable estate was held to be within the power of a curator bonis, much more must a power to compromise about such an estate be so. Further, in the case of Ross v. Devine, 30th June 1878, 5 R. 1015, deed embodied a compromise entered into with a view to avoid a litigation, and the Court would not readily set it aside now that all the representatives who had transacted with the curator bonis were dead. When the curator bonis found himself vested in 1872 with the rights of his ward, he was face to face with a situation in which, while the estate was entitled to a sum of money from Mrs Taylor's representatives, they had large counter claims against the estate, and he thought the matter a fair subject for such a compromise as he was entitled to make both at common law¹ and under the statute.² The question as to who at the time had the interest in the estate was irrelevant, for had the lunatic recovered his sanity he might have made another will. All the parties then interested were represented. If the curator had failed to make proper inquiry sibi imputet, the defenders had not induced him to enter into the transaction.³ He gave up one claim and they another. If he acted improperly he would have to answer to his ward or his ward's representatives. That was no reason for setting aside a transaction with the defenders, who had acted honestly, and were entitled to rely upon the contract. More-the power of a curator bonis to adjust differences between his ward and her sister seems to have been recognised. The 17th section of the Pupils Protection Act, 12 and 13 Vict. cap. 51, which provides for the Court granting power to factors to perform exceptional acts of factorial management, does not apply to this case.

"Further, I am disposed to think that the power of a curator bonis to compromise was statutory at the date of the contract under reduction, i.e. 1873. That question stands thus: Power to compromise is one of the general powers conferred on trustees by the 2d section of the Trusts Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97); but that section is not made applicable to curators bonis. It is, however, provided by the 2d section of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63), that in the construction of the recited Acts—one of these being the Trusts Act, 1867—trustee shall include tutor, curator, and judicial factor, and judicial factor shall mean curator bonis. It appears to me that from the manner in which this provision is expressed it must be held to be declaratory, and retrospective, and therefore to make it possible to affirm that, in 1873, the Trusts Act of 1867 conferred the power of compromise on curators bonis, or, otherwise, recognised the existence of that power. If so, the contract was intra vires of the curator bonis.

"I do not know whether this question has come up for determination, and I was not referred to any decision on the point. But I may refer to the Attorney-General v. Theobald, 1890, L. R., 24 Q. B. D. 557, in which a similar point was decided. It was there held that a provision in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, enacting that a prior Act should be construed so as to embrace a certain class of property passing under a settlement, was retrospective so as to subject to the provisions of that Act property of the class in question although payable before the date of the later Act.

"It is further pleaded by the pursuer that the contract is reducible because it was granted under mutual and essential error. It is said that parties acted under the belief that all parties interested were represented,

No. 82. over, the alleged error was not within the deed under reduction. The error was non-essential. Nothing short of fraud would avail to set aside a solemn contract. (2) The pursuer had no title to sue. It mattered not that the action was brought by the pursuers as executors and individuals. The pursuers were suing in the interests of the executry estate as a whole, and not for the enforcement of any individual interest. The reclaimer was therefore excluded from claiming under the action as an individual for his own interest. The question then came to be, whether one out of six executors could persist in an action from which the other five had departed? That question had been answered negatively as far as concerned trustees,¹ and it fell to receive the same answer in the case of executors.² Executors, like trustees, were entitled to act by a majority. Here five of them saw the chance of a large part of the estate being carried off, and they compromised the action. The reclaimer had no right to interfere with a good arrangement made by the majority.

LORD YOUNG.—The Lord Ordinary has stated the facts of the case fully, and, I think, accurately, but a briefer statement will suffice to enable me to and that this was an erroneous belief, because the pursuers were not represented, and it has now turned out that they are entitled to the whole of the ward's estate. I understood that this is the error referred to in the pursuer's plea, and it was maintained that it was a mutual error which vitiated the contract. I consider that argument entirely fallacious, and that there was no error of the kind. All the parties who had any right or interest were represented, and the pursuers had then no interest whatever, and, of course, could have none so long as Alexander Taylor lived. It may be also noticed that, as it now appears, at the date of the contract, Mrs Scott, and not the pursuers, was Alexander Taylor's executor-nominate. I do not find any other error averred. It is, as I think, not averred that Mr Wink was under any error in regard to the extent of his ward's claims on Mrs Taylor's estate, and certainly it is not averred that Mrs Craig or those whom she represented misled the curator bonis to any extent. What is said or suggested is that the curator bonis was ignorant of the extent of these claims because he was careless; and no doubt it is intended to be alleged that his carelessness arose from the fact that he thought he was acting with the consent of all who could ever succeed to Alexander Taylor, and that he overlooked or disregarded the contingencies that Alexander Taylor might leave a will or might recover his sanity. But I am not aware of any authority for setting aside a contract on such grounds against the will of the other parties to it, who did nothing to induce the error or ignorance of the former party, and who were, in my opinion, entitled to rely on the contract. I think that Alexander Taylor could not have reduced this deed had he recovered his reason, although he might possibly have had an action against the curator bonis and his cautioner. The mere fact that a contracting party is ill informed about the subject-matter of a contract has never, so far as I am aware, been held to be a reason for reducing it.

"None of the cases quoted by the pursuer appear to me to be authorities which warrant reduction of this deed on the grounds pleaded; and I am unable to see that the conclusions of accounting can be reached if the deed be not reduced. Even if I had sustained the pursuer's title, I must therefore have decided against him on the relevancy."

explain my opinion on the only question—one of law and not of fact—decided by the interlocutor reclaimed against, and which does not involve any disputed matter of fact. That question is, whether the reclamer James Edward Scott has a title to pursue this action, or, as I should prefer to put it, to continue the pursuit of it after and notwithstanding of the minute and the interlocutor of 19th January 1895 following upon it.

No. 82.

Jan. 29, 1897.
 Scott v.
 Craig's Repre-

By that minute and interlocutor this action was settled and taken out of Court, the defenders being assoilzied. It appears on the face of the minute that the reclamer did not assent to the settlement, and we must take the fact to be so. If this fact invalidates the settlement and absolvitor, any person having legitimate interest may challenge the proceeding and have it set aside. But while it stands I am of opinion that we must regard the action as out of Court by legitimate settlement and decree of absolvitor. It follows that the reclamer has no title to pursue it.

It is right, however, that I should express the opinion which I entertain that the reclamer's dissent, or rather declinature to assent to the settlement which his five co-executors deemed prudent and proper in the performance of their executorial duty, and therefore resolved to make, was not necessarily an obstacle to their making it, or a ground for impeaching it when made. There may unquestionably be grounds on which one of six executors may interfere to hinder the settlement of a pending action (or anything else) proposed to be made by the other five, or take proceedings to set it aside when made, but I cannot countenance the proposition that the mere fact of his dissent or refusal to assent is sufficient. The reclamer has really no ground on which to ask the Court to disregard the minute and interlocutor in question and allow him to proceed with the action as an action at his instance, except this, that his assent was not given but refused, and that his co-executors could not validly act without it.

I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary in the opinion which he has expressed, to the effect that this action, which the majority of the executors pursuing it compromised and settled as they did, was irrelevant. There are certainly plausible and probable grounds for that opinion, and if it was held by the advisers of the executors and by all but one of their own number, it would be unfortunate if the law enabled that one to veto a compromise on reasonable terms by merely declining to assent to it. I allude to this matter of relevancy only to make this illustrative observation on the question of title.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. The present action was raised by the executors-nominate of the deceased Alexander Taylor for reduction of an agreement, the terms of which were said to be prejudicial to the interests of the executry estate, and for recovery of a large debt said to be due to that estate. The action was brought in the interest of the executry estate as a whole, and not for the enforcement of any individual beneficial interest. The pursuers are no doubt described in the instance of the summons as executors "and as individuals." But there are neither averments nor conclusions applicable to any individual claim. Such an action could have been brought by a majority of the executors, and I

No. 82. think it was within the competency of a majority of them to abandon or compromise such an action. If they did so to the prejudice of any beneficiary they must of course answer for it. But the discharge, by a majority of the executors of the action, just like the discharge of a debt, would be quite a sufficient discharge to the defender in the one case, and the debtor in the other, to whom the discharge was granted. I think, therefore, the pursuer Mr James Edward Scott cannot now insist in that action, which his co-executors have discharged. As an executor he cannot do so, because the demands of the executry estate, made by the executors as a body, have been satisfied. The case of *Bryson v. Torrance*¹ does not decide anything to the contrary. It was a special case, where the title to sue an action brought by one out of three executors was sustained, in respect that one of the executors was the debtor who was being sued, and the remaining executors declined to concur in the action. To have refused to sustain the title in such a case would have been to prevent the executry estate recovering its debt. But the case here is not that no other executor will concur with Mr Scott, but that having concurred with him their claim, so far as they think they have right or interest to enforce it, has been satisfied. As an individual Mr Scott cannot, in my opinion, insist in this action (whatever other remedy may be open to him), because the form of the action excludes him from claiming under it as an individual for his own interest. The case of *Watt v. Roger's Trustees*² (referred to by the Lord Ordinary as relied upon by Mr Scott), certainly gives some countenance to the view that a beneficiary under a trust may be allowed to sue the debtor of a trust-estate for payment of a debt due to the trust. I am not, as at present advised, prepared to follow that case, in which there was a serious division of opinion, as a conclusive authority.

On the question of relevancy I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and have nothing to add.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Looking to the whole scope of the summons, I think the pursuers sue as executors for an alleged debt due to the executry, and as a majority of the executors might have raised the action, so, in the absence of exceptional reasons to the contrary, may they compromise it or decide in the interests of the executry not to proceed with it. I do not doubt that in some circumstances the Court may sustain the title of a minority of executors to raise or proceed with an action. But all that we see of this case leads to the conclusion that the five executors who have compromised their claim and withdrawn from the action exercised a very sound discretion in deciding not to proceed, because, in my opinion, the pursuers' averments are utterly insufficient to infer reduction of the agreement sought to be reduced. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed.

Morrison v.
Smith & Co.

Reparation—Slander—Newspaper—Anonymous letter—Diligence for recovery of original letter.—In an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of a newspaper founded on statements contained in an anonymous letter published in the newspaper, the pursuer, a parish clergyman, averred that the letter “was written or procured to be written by the defenders for publication in their newspaper in pursuance of a malicious design to injure the pursuer,” and “to destroy his reputation” as a clergyman. The defenders refused to disclose the name of the writer of the letter, and the pursuer moved for a diligence for the recovery of the original letter.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) refused the diligence.

Cunningham v. Duncan & Jameson, Feb. 2, 1889, 16 R. 383, distinguished.

Opinion reserved (per Lord Young) as to the right of a person who alleges that he has been slandered by an anonymous letter in a newspaper, to discover the name of the writer with a view to proceedings against him.

Observed (per Lord Moncreiff) that as the defenders refused to disclose the name of the writer of the letter, they would not be entitled to prove an averment made by them that they had received the letter in the ordinary course of business, and in good faith.

ON 16th May 1896 the Rev. Thomas Angus Morrison brought an action against J. T. Smith & Company, publishers of the Kirkintilloch and Lenzie Mercury and East Dumbartonshire and Campsie Advertiser, concluding for £2500 as damages. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

The pursuer averred that (cond. 3) the annual report of the Kirkintilloch Parish Church for the year ending 31st December 1895 was issued to the congregation in March 1896. “In the issue of their said newspaper, dated Saturday, 28th March 1896, the defenders falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, printed and published the following statement in the form of a letter to the editor from an anonymous correspondent:—

‘Kirkintilloch Parish Church Annual Report.

‘Sir,—The parish church congregation has at last been supplied with a copy of this interesting report. The parish church is like no other church in this respect, that there is no congregational meeting at which the report can be presented, discussed, and adopted, and for this reason perhaps you will allow me space in your paper to draw attention to one or two points.

‘The report as a whole, I think, is the weakest production of the kind I have ever perused, and comparing it with the reports of 1891 and 1892, or with those of any other church, it is mere rubbish, and certainly not worth the expense of the printing.

‘To begin with, there is no pastoral address from the minister to the people. What can be the reason of this? Is it because that he cannot say, as in 1891, that “he visited every member of the church at least once during the year”; that he is ashamed to say that there are members of the church and families that he has not visited since he became minister of the church? or is it that he would not like to say that he has neglected the sick and the dying, and the aged and infirm of the congregation, who are unable to attend the church? I certainly would like to know the reason why there is no address, and I would have liked as much to have read the address, if there had been one.

No. 83. 'We have a report from the kirk-session which is the essence of brevity. From it I observe the membership has fallen from 966 to 961. Why is it not increasing by fifties and hundreds? The reason is not far to seek. The parish is secured; there is no need of swelling the communion-roll with the names of people who never go to a church. Their vote is all that was wanted, and they are not now required.

Jan. 30, 1897.
Morrison v.
Smith & Co.

'We come to the treasurer's report, and it is an interesting document.' The letter quoted then proceeded to criticise the treasurer's report, and was signed "Auld Kirk."

"A print of the said newspaper containing the said statement is produced and referred to. The statements in answer are denied."

The defenders answered;—(Ans. 3) "The annual report for the year 1895, which was published in or about March 1896, and the letter to the defenders' newspaper are referred to. Quoad ultra denied. The said letter was received by the defenders and was printed by them in the ordinary course of business, and in good faith, and without any intention of injuring the pursuer, towards whom the defenders entertained no malice whatsoever. The said letter bore to be, and was, a criticism of the annual report of the parish church, which was a public document in which a large portion of the community was interested. It was accompanied, according to the usual practice, with the name and address of the writer—not for publication—but as a guarantee of good faith."

The pursuer then set forth (cond. 4) the innuendoes appearing from the issues allowed infra. The defenders denied that the letter bore the meaning attributed to it by the pursuer, and averred that it was a fair comment on the facts stated in the report, and that its statements were true in point of fact, as shewn by a number of details specified.

The pursuer further averred;—" . . . The said letter was written or procured to be written by the defenders for publication in their newspaper in pursuance of a malicious design to injure the pursuer, and with the calumnious and injurious object of destroying his reputation, respectability, character, and usefulness as a clergyman, and of holding him up to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. The defenders have identified themselves with and have made their newspaper the mouthpiece of a small number of persons in the parish, who, mainly from motives of personal hostility to the pursuer, desired to form themselves into a separate congregation in connection with the Church of Scotland, and petitioned the Presbytery for this purpose. There being no bona fide occasion for a separate church in the village of Kirkintilloch, where the petitioners proposed that the new church should be situated, the pursuer and the kirk-session of Kirkintilloch in discharge of their duty opposed the petition of said persons before the Church Courts, and it was ultimately refused by the General Assembly in May 1896. The said letter has had the effect of lowering and degrading the pursuer in the eyes of the public." (Ans. 5) "Denied."

The pursuer then averred, and the defenders admitted, that the defenders had declined to give the name of the writer of the letter.

The following issues and counter issue were adjusted for the trial of the cause:—Issues.—(1) Whether, in the issue of The Kirkintilloch and Lenzie Mercury and East Dumbartonshire and Campsie Advertiser, dated on or about 28th March 1896, the defenders printed and published the letter printed in the schedule hereto appended? No. 83. Whether the said letter is in whole or in part of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer, in pursuance of his candidature for the appointment of parish minister of Kirkintilloch, had procured persons to be enrolled on the communion-roll of said parish who were to his knowledge unfit to be communicants, with the motive of securing their votes in his favour, or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer—to his loss, injury, and damage? (2) Whether the said letter is in whole or in part of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer, after being ordained as parish minister of Kirkintilloch, had, in breach of his duty as such minister, neglected the sick and dying, and the aged and infirm of the congregation, or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer—to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £2500? Counter issue.—“Whether the pursuer in breach of his duty as parish minister of Kirkintilloch neglected the sick and dying, and aged and infirm of the congregation?”

Jan. 30, 1897.
Morrison v.
Smith & Co.

The pursuer then moved for a diligence for the recovery of, inter alia, the following:—“(3) The original manuscript or manuscripts of the said letter. (4) All letters received by the defenders, or any of them, or any one on their behalf, between 1st March and 7th April 1896, relating to the letter in question, or to the authorship or publication thereof.”

On 2d December the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) granted the diligence.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The general rule was settled that a newspaper which undertook the responsibility of a letter published in its columns could not be compelled to disclose the name of the writer in an action for damages on account of slander alleged to be contained in the letter.¹ *Cunningham*² was exceptional, and was recognised by the Judges who decided it to be so. The averment there was that the newspaper had inserted a number of letters bearing to proceed from different persons, which would give readers of the paper the impression that there was a general fama against the pursuer, whereas the truth was (as the pursuer averred) that all the letters proceeded from a single source, viz., the paper itself. Nothing of that sort was averred here. There was only one letter.

Argued for the pursuer;—This case was within the principle of Cunningham's case, which was, that a pursuer complaining of a letter regarding him in a newspaper was entitled to discover whether the letter was the genuine production of a third party, seeing that, if it was not, the pretence by the paper that it was amounted to an aggravation of the injury to the pursuer. The fact that there was only one letter did not affect the pursuer's right to test its genuineness, although it might affect the amount of the damages.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It has been the practice for a very long time, and laid down as the right course to pursue, that where a newspaper which is responsible and able to meet the case of a pursuer alleging slander in the ¹ Lowe v. Taylor, June 24, 1843, 5 D. 1261, 15 Scot. Jur. 601; Brims v. Reid, May 28, 1885, 12 R. 1016.

No. 83. columns of the newspaper undertakes responsibility, the proprietor is not called on to give the name of the correspondent.

Jan. 30, 1897.

Morrison v.
Smith & Co.

It is quite true that the rule is not absolute. Notwithstanding the fact that the newspaper is prepared to take all responsibility, there may be circumstances in which the Court may allow such inquiries by recovery of documents as may shew who is the writer of the letter.

It was so decided in the case of Cunningham,¹ which was a case of a very peculiar description. It was alleged by the pursuer on record that the letters were not genuine letters at all, received by the editor of the newspaper and inserted by him, but were the result of a deliberate plot to injure the pursuer by putting in fictitious letters, which had not been received from correspondents.

It was argued in that case that, if recoveries were allowed, they might reveal who the writers were, if it was not the fact that the letters were fictitious, but, as the Lord President pointed out, persons who write such letters are not entitled to great consideration; and in the particular case his Lordship was for disregarding that argument, although he recognised that it applied as a general rule.

I am, therefore, of opinion that we should refuse the diligence.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I desire to give no opinion as to the right of a person, who says he is slandered by a letter in a newspaper, to discover who has slandered him, with the view to proceedings against the writer. This is not an application of that sort. It is an action in which issues have been adjusted against a newspaper, and it is as good as it can be made irrespective of the question who was the author of the letter, if other than the paper itself. As to the proceedings for ascertaining who was the author of letters—slanderous letters—sent to a newspaper which might not be able to meet the responsibility at all, I am giving no opinion now. But in such a case it would appear to me to be very strange if the law afforded no means of enabling a person to ascertain who it was that had slandered him. It appears to me to be just the same as if the slanderer instead of getting a newspaper to publish his slander, had got a billsticker to stick it up. In that case I should think that there must be some means of ascertaining who was guilty of such conduct.

Reserving, however, my opinion on that question, I agree that this diligence should be refused, and with expenses.

LORD TRAYNER.—If I had thought that this case was indistinguishable from the case of Cunningham,¹ I would have agreed with the Lord Ordinary. But I think the cases very different. They are materially different in so far as the species facti are concerned, and give rise to the application of a different rule. In *Cunningham's*¹ case, the pursuer's averment was that the defender had written or procured to be written several letters which he published in his newspaper under different signatures, intending to represent them (as he did in a subsequent editorial article) as the spontaneous expressions of the opinion of divers members of the public anent the pursuer's alleged misconduct; and that this was part of a systematic plan to destroy or injure the pursuer's reputation. These averments presented a very special case, and it was in respect of its specialty, as I read the opinions of the Judges there delivered, that the Court adopted the course, which was recognised as exceptional, of giving the pursuer a diligence to recover the original manuscripts of the libellous letters—although the defenders took the whole responsibility of their publication. No. 83. Jan. 30, 1897. Morrison v. Smith & Co.

Here there is only one letter published, which the pursuer avers was written or procured to be written by the defenders. Now, whether it was written by the defenders or by somebody else at their request or instigation, does not seem to me of very much importance, if indeed of any, for the defenders adopt the letter and responsibility in connection with it. They virtually take the position of the writer, whoever he may be; and at the trial the defenders should be dealt with exactly as if they were the avowed authors of the letter. In this view of the case, the inquiry which the diligence asked for is intended to aid is irrelevant to the issue, and I think should not be granted.

LORD MONCREIFF.—As a general rule the publisher of a newspaper is not compelled to disclose the name of the writer of a letter published anonymously in his paper—Lowe v. Taylor,¹ Cunningham v. Duncan & Jameson.² This exemption can only be justified on the footing that the publisher accepts full responsibility for the contents of the letter, and that thus the disclosure of the name of the writer would not materially benefit the person who complains of the slander.

Accordingly the Court will not in ordinary circumstances assist a pursuer, in an action for damages against a publisher, to ascertain the name of the writer by granting such a diligence as is here asked. In the case of Cunningham v. Duncan & Jameson,² the application for a diligence was treated as unusual, and it was granted only on account of the exceptional averments made by the pursuers, which were to the effect that the defenders, the printers and publishers of certain newspapers, had themselves written not one but eight letters which were published in their papers, and which bore to be written by different persons, thus falsely representing that there was a concursus of independent public opinion on the matter, upon which they commented in leading articles. It was clear that if this fraudulent conduct on the part of the defenders were established the damages might be materially increased.

In the present case, however, the pursuer complains of only one letter, and the only purpose which such a diligence would serve would be to discover the true author. Whether the writer were discovered to be the defender or a third party, I do not think that the amount of damages to be awarded against the defenders would be appreciably affected by the disclosure. There is this further objection to granting the application, that the pursuer's averments are far from specific. If diligence were granted in the present case, I do not see why it should not be granted in every case where the pursuer avers that he believes that the publisher wrote the letter complained of himself. At the same time, I must say that in my opinion the defenders can derive no benefit from the averments which they make in answer 3, to the effect that the letter was received and printed in the ordinary course of business and in good faith. The reason why the publisher of a newspaper is absolved from disclosing the name of his correspondent is, as I have said, because the name is not material to the pursuer's case, because the publisher takes the writer's place to all effects, and is deprived of all privilege. But if a publisher, while refusing to disclose the name of his correspondent, were to attempt to take benefit and obtain mitigation of damages by proving that he received the letter in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, it would at once become material to the pursuer to have the means of testing this by ascertaining the author's name. Therefore in my opinion the defender should not be allowed to lead evidence to that effect.

Morrison v.
Smith & Co.

There are passages in the opinions of some of the Judges in Cunningham's case which, taken apart from the circumstances, would seem to support the pursuer's application. But taken as a whole, I read that decision as proceeding upon the exceptional circumstances of the case.

In the result, while I think it will be open to the pursuer at the trial to object to the defender leading evidence of the averments contained in the third answer, I think that the diligence now asked should not be granted.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, refused the diligence, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

The company having presented a petition praying the Court to confirm the resolution and the proposed reduction of capital and to dispense with the addition of the words “and reduced” to the company's name, the Court, after a remit for inquiry and a report, granted the prayer of the petition.

1ST DIVISION. ON 6th November 1896 the Banknock Coal Company, Limited, presented a petition praying the Court to pronounce an order (1) confirming the reduction of the company's capital, as resolved upon by a special resolution of the company passed on 18th September, and confirmed by the company on 9th October 1896; (2) to approve of a minute to be registered (under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1867) along with the order by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and (3) to dispense altogether with the addition of the words “and reduced” to its name.

The Court remitted to Mr Charles B. Logan, W.S., "to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings, and the reasons for the proposed reduction of capital." No. 84.

Mr Logan reported that the proceedings were regular, and that there were sufficient reasons to warrant the proposed reduction of capital.*

* "REPORT.— . . . By the memorandum of association the capital of the company was declared to be £25,000, divided into 2000 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 500 preference shares of £10 each. Of this capital 1602 ordinary shares have been issued, 1054 of which are fully paid up, and on the remaining 548 the sum of £6 each has been paid; 492 preference shares have also been issued, and are fully paid up. The remaining 398 ordinary and 8 preference shares are still unissued. By its articles of association (No. 58), the company has power from time to time, by special resolution, to reduce its capital.

"It is explained in the petition that funds of the company, amounting to £2300, have been misappropriated by an official of the company, and in order to recoup the company against loss, two of the shareholders of the company have, by minutes of agreement, agreed to the cancellation of, in all, 230 ordinary paid-up shares of the company belonging to them, provided that the capital of the company is reduced from £25,000 to £22,700.

"Accordingly, at extraordinary meetings of the shareholders held at Glasgow on the 18th of September, and 9th of October, both in the year 1896, the following special resolution was passed and confirmed, viz:— 'That the capital of the company be reduced from £25,000, divided into 2000 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 500 preference shares of £10 each, to £22,700, divided into 1770 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 500 preference shares of £10 each; and that such reduction be effected—(a) by cancelling the 180 paid-up ordinary shares numbered . . . 'and (b) by cancelling the 50 paid-up ordinary shares numbered . . . ' " as provided for in two provisional agreements between the company and the two holders of these shares respectively.

"By article 18 of its memorandum of association the company has power to accept surrenders of its shares. The surrender proposed in the present case is not in consideration of a payment in money or money's worth by the company, and it appears not to be ultra vires, and is a transaction which may be competently carried out without the sanction of the Court. The company, however, desires to treat the surrendered shares as permanently extinguished, and unless the capital of the company is formally reduced, the surrendered shares might be again issued, and they would still be part of the company's nominal capital and would affect the nominal rate of dividend. It is this reduction of capital which your Lordships are asked to confirm.

"So far as I am aware, the only reported case at all similar to the present that has come before the Scottish Courts, is that of The West End Café Company, Limited (and Reduced), Jan. 16, 1894, 21 R. 381, in which the Court confirmed a reduction of capital where certain shares had been purchased by the company and cancelled. Several petitions of a like nature, however, have come before the English Courts, and in the petition of In re Gatling Gun, Limited, 1890, L. R., 43 Chan. Div. 628, in circumstances somewhat similar to those of the present case, Justice North sanctioned a reduction of capital following upon the surrender of shares to the company.

"In the present instance, the shares which have been surrendered are fully paid up, and as no further liability attaches to them their cancellation will not affect the rights and liabilities of the shareholders of the company inter se. By the 3d section of the Companies Act, 1877, it is declared that the word 'capital,' as used in the Companies Act, 1867, shall include paid-up capital, and that the power to reduce capital conferred by that Act shall include a power 'to cancel any lost capital or any capital unrepresented by

Trust—General power of sale—Prohibition in codicil against selling a particular subject—Petition for power to sell—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 3.—A truster in his settlement gave his trustees a general power of sale. In a codicil he directed,—“As I consider that the value of property in B will improve, I direct and appoint my trustees to hold and retain the property known as K . . . and not to sell or dispose of the same before the youngest of my sons attains twenty-one years of age.”

In a petition brought by the trustees before the youngest child had attained majority, under the 3d section of the Trusts Act, 1867, for power to sell the property dealt with in the codicil in the interests of the trust-estate, the Court (dub. Lord M'Laren) refused the petition on the ground that, assuming that a sale was “expedient for the execution of the trust,” it was “inconsistent with the intention thereof.”

1ST DIVISION. JOHN MARSHALL, corn merchant in Leith, executed a trust-disposition and settlement in which he disposed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, for the purposes of the trust.

The trustees were requested and authorised to carry on, for the benefit of the family, the business of John Marshall & Company at Borrowstounness, with power to them to wind up the business, or sell available assets.' The reduction of capital which the petitioners ask your Lordships to confirm appears to fall under this description, and the loss sustained by the company above referred to, and the subsequent surrender and cancellation of the shares, appear to me to warrant the reduction. . . .

“It is provided by the 4th section of the Companies Act, 1877, that where the reduction of capital does not involve ‘the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital, or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital,’ the creditors of the company shall not, unless the Court otherwise direct, be entitled to object or required to consent to the reduction, and that in that case the Court may dispense with the addition of the words ‘and reduced’ to the name of the company. In the present case, the cancelled shares are fully paid up, and no repayment to the shareholders of paid-up capital is involved, and, therefore, under the section above referred to, no objection on the part of creditors of the company is competent, and no consent by them is required. By your Lordships’ interlocutor of 7th November 1896, the addition of the words ‘and reduced’ to the name of the company was dispensed with from that date, and until disposal of the petition; and I submit that it is a case for also dispensing with the words ‘and reduced’ after the disposal of the petition. . . .

“I have to report that the whole proceedings prior to and since the date of the presentation of the petition have been regular, and that there are sufficient reasons to warrant the proposed reduction of capital, and that accordingly the prayer of the petition may be granted.”

the trustees' interest therein, as they might see expedient; and he also conferred upon his trustees power to continue to hold his investments as at his death, or reinvest the same—to lease, sell, or dispose of all or any part of the trust-estate, all as therein specified.

By a codicil, dated 18th June 1877, Mr Marshall provided as follows:—"As I consider that the value of property in Borrowstounness will improve, I direct and appoint my trustees to hold and retain the property known as Kinglass Brewery, belonging to me, and not to sell or dispose of the same before the youngest of my sons by my present marriage attains twenty-one years of age."

Mr Marshall died on 1st January 1879, survived by nine children, and the trust was thereafter managed by the trustees.

On 28th December 1896 this petition was presented to the Court by the trustees under section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97),* for authority to sell and dispose of the property known as the Kinglass Brewery.

The petitioners averred that all of the children of the deceased Mr Marshall had attained majority, excepting Andrew Pratt Marshall, who would not attain that age till February 1898.

They further stated that the trust-estate, consisting of heritable property, feu-duties, furniture, the trustees' interest in the estate of John Marshall & Company, and certain shares in the company, at present unsaleable but of hopeful value, amounted to £4000, and that there were bonds over the estate amounting to £2500, and other debts amounting to £2000. They further stated that they had discharged some of the most urgent claims in order to protect the estate from embarrassment.

"In order to protect the estate and pay off the debts, it is necessary to realise the heritable property, including the property known as Kinglass Brewery. It is considered there is no chance of its improving in value, and the present would be a good time to sell. Had the said Andrew Pratt Marshall been of age, the petitioners would, under their powers in the trust-deed, have at once disposed of it, but owing to the terms of the codicil referred to, special powers are required to enable them to do so."

The petition was unopposed.

On 20th January 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) reported the petition to the First Division.†

* The Trusts Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 3, enacted,—“It shall be competent to the Court of Session, on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to the trustees . . . on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof . . . (1) to sell the trust-estate or any part of it.”

† “NOTE.—My difficulty in granting the prayer of this petition arises from the express terms of the prohibition against selling. In several of the reported cases under section 3 of the Trusts Act, a distinction has been drawn between a positive direction not to sell (as in Hay's Trustees v. Hay Milne, June 13, 1873, 11 Macph. 694) and a destination from which it could be inferred that sale was not in the testator's mind (as in Weir's Trustees, June 13, 1877, 4 R. 876). Cases of the former class have been held not to fall within the statute, because, however great the expediency of selling might be, it was impossible to affirm that the power asked was ‘not inconsistent with the intention’ of the trust.

The petitioners, in addition to their contention as appearing in the Lord Ordinary's note, further argued that the codicil did not indicate the main purposes of the trust, but was only an administrative direction, and therefore a prohibition in it was not of the same force as if it had been contained in the trust-deed itself.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The truster has in so many words directed and appointed his trustees to "hold and retain" this property, and "not to sell or dispose of the same" before a certain date.

I am quite unable to get over this direction, and think on that ground we should refuse the petition.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. We have statutory authority for granting such a petition if a sale is not inconsistent with the purposes of the trust. There is in this deed a direct prohibition against a sale before a certain date, and I do not see how it can be said that a sale before that date could be consistent with that direction.

LORD M'LAREN.—I understand that this petition is maintained on the ground that the direction contained in the codicil is not one of the main purposes of the trust, but is only an administrative direction.

That appears from the preamble to the clause, where the truster states that he considers the value of property in Bo'ness will improve, and for that reason he gives the direction to defer selling his property there until his youngest child should be of age.

Now, it must be admitted that there may be directions in a trust which in some measure conflict with the notion of a power of sale, and which will not exclude the action of the Court under the Trusts Acts. The mere omission of a power of sale may indicate that the truster did not intend that there should be a sale, or there may be cases where it is shewn by implication that the truster did not contemplate a sale; yet, if the necessity arises, the Court may be legitimately moved to grant the statutory power of sale which the truster, not foreseeing the circumstances, did not himself grant. The question is one of degree, and unless this administrative direction is to vailed, because certain lands were excepted from the general power of sale. In Sutherland's Trustees, however, July 20, 1892, 29 S. L. R. 903, where there was a somewhat similar exception, the Court granted power of sale in order to preserve the trust-estate against the diligence of creditors.

"The circumstances of the present case as stated in the petition have a strong resemblance to those in Sutherland's case, and much may depend on the precise extent to which the trustees are being pressed by creditors. I have thought it better not, at my own hand, to incur the expense of a remit to a man of business, but I have asked the petitioners to be prepared with exact information on this head.

"It is to be observed that the prohibition here expires in February 1898, so that, unless creditors are very urgent, the trustees could accomplish their purpose in little more than a year without any authority from the Court. This circumstance was founded on by counsel as diminishing the force of the prohibition, but it may be replied that the prohibition, while it lasts, is couched in as strong terms as could well be used. It is not merely that this particular property is excepted from a general power of sale (as in Whyte and Sutherland), but that the trustees are directed 'not to sell or dispose of the same' before the majority of the testator's youngest son."

be treated as having that positive character which would exclude the statutory jurisdiction, I should be disposed to think that the power might be granted on the ground that this is a direction intended only to secure as large a price as possible, and is not one of those conditions to which the statute refers as "the purposes of the trust," or, as the Lord President in a previous case¹ has called them, the "main purposes" of the trust.

But as your Lordships think that the case is one where an order of sale would be inconsistent with the purposes of the trust, I am content that the petition should be dismissed, because powers of sale should only be granted where the question of competency is free from doubt.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The statute requires, in order to the exercise of the power which it gives the Court to enable trustees to sell where the trust-deed contains no such power, that two conditions shall be satisfied—first, that the sale shall be expedient for the execution of the main purposes of the trust, and second (and equally imperative with the first), that it shall not be inconsistent with the intention of the truster.

Now, a sale may or may not be expedient for the execution of the general purposes of the trust. I assume that it will be so, although there has been no inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining the facts. Mr Smith tells us that it will be, and I therefore take it for granted for the purpose of the argument. But, assuming that it will be expedient, the further question arises, whether it is consistent with what the truster intended? On this matter I can have no doubt whatever, because he says in so many words that the trustees are not to sell before 1898.

THE COURT refused the petition.

MISS SUSANNAH CRAMB (Cramb's Executrix), Defender.—Clyde. Feb. 2, 1897.
MacGown v. Cramb.

Process—Interlocutor allowing proof—Motion for recall on ground of res noviter—Nobile officium—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 28.—After an interlocutor allowing proof in an action has become final in terms of section 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the Court cannot, in the exercise of its nobile officium, order its recall on the application of one of the parties to the cause.

THIS was an action at the instance of Mrs Susannah Cramb or MacGown, with consent of her husband, against Miss Susannah Cramb, general disponent and sole executrix of John Cramb, for declarator that the pursuer, as one of the heirs-portioners of James Cramb, her uncle, who had died in 1876, had acquired by survivorship of him, under section 9 of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), a personal right to one-half pro indiviso of the said James Cramb's one-half pro indiviso interest in certain heritable properties.

 MacGown v. On 3d November 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) closed the Cramb. record, and allowed parties a proof of their respective averments.

On 20th November the Lord Ordinary granted a diligence at the instance of the defender for the recovery of certain documents.

One of the documents recovered by the defender under this diligence was an antenuptial contract of marriage between the pursuer and her husband.

On 5th January 1897 the defender moved the Lord Ordinary for leave to add to the record a statement in regard to this marriage-contract. She further moved the Lord Ordinary to recall the interlocutor allowing a proof, and to send the case to the Procedure-roll to discuss the question of the pursuers' title to sue, on the ground that the newly discovered marriage-contract had an important bearing thereon.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the defender to amend the record as craved, and thereafter of new closed the record and reported the cause to the First Division.*

The defender moved the Court to authorise the Lord Ordinary to recall the interlocutor allowing a proof, and to send the case to the Procedure-roll. She submitted that once the case was brought before the Court, the Court could deal with it, and that in the circumstances the course she suggested was clearly appropriate, as she intended to maintain, on a construction of the marriage-contract, that the pursuer had no title to sue.

The pursuer opposed the motion. She stated that she maintained that she had a title to sue, and was willing to proceed with the proof, and argued that under the Court of Session Act,¹ an interlocutor allowing proof was absolutely binding unless reclaimed against within six days.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The section of the Act of Parliament which Mr Christie has referred to makes this a final interlocutor unless it is reclaimed against, and therefore it seems to me we can do nothing.

LORD ADAM.—I never understood that the nobile officium could supersede an Act of Parliament.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

STURROCK & STURROCK, S.S.C.—R. AINSLIE BROWN, S.S.C.—Agents.

* "NOTE.—At the closing of the record on 3d November last, the Lord Ordinary, on the motion of the parties, allowed to them a proof of their averments. On 5th January current the defender moved for leave to add to the record certain statements of the nature of res noviter. It appeared to me that these statements should be considered, and accordingly the record has been amended by the addition of these statements, with the pursuers' answers thereto.

"The defender has contended that the effect of these statements is to destroy the pursuers' title to sue, and that therefore the interlocutor allowing proof should be recalled. As I do not seem to have power to recall that interlocutor, the defender's counsel moved that I should report the cause."

M brought an action against the trustees of a savings bank for payment of £50 which had been deposited in her name, and which she alleged the officials of the bank had paid away upon a forged order to another person. The defenders denied that the order was forged, or that they were responsible even if it was. They pleaded that the action was excluded by the arbitration clause in the statute. At the date when the action was brought M had no funds at her credit in the books of the bank.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the action being founded upon the contract of deposit involved a question between the bank and a depositor in the sense of the statute, which fell to be decided by arbitration.

THIS was an action at the instance of Mrs Elizabeth Melrose against Robert Adam and others, as trustees for the Edinburgh Savings Bank, for payment of £50. 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kincairney.

The pursuer averred that on 28th January 1895 the bank had negligently paid away £50, which was then standing at her credit in the books, to her sister, who had stolen the pursuer's deposit-book, and forged the pursuer's name to an order for the withdrawal of the money.

The defenders admitted that the officials of the bank had paid the £50 to the pursuer's sister, but denied that the order on which it was paid had been forged. They further founded upon the Regulations of the Treasury for Trustee Savings Banks and the rules of the bank as protecting them, even if the order was forged.

The defenders also founded upon section 48 of the Act 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 87, as amended by section 2, subsection 1, of the Savings Bank (Barrister) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 52), and section 4 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 60),* and and vested in the Registrar, as defined by the Friendly Societies Act, 1875." Section 4 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, enacts,—“The Registrar means . . . for Scotland or Ireland, the Assistant Registrar for either country respectively.”

* “OPINION.—This is an interesting and important case. It is an action against the trustees for the Edinburgh Savings Bank for payment of £50. The pursuer avers that on 28th January 1895 the bank paid that sum, which was standing at her credit in their books, to her sister. She avers that her sister obtained payment by stealing her pass-book, and by forging an order or requisition for withdrawal of the money, and by presenting the pass-book and forged order to the bank. The defenders admit that the £50 was paid to the pursuer's sister. They do not admit that the order on which it was paid was forged, but they contend that they are not responsible even if it was. The question between the parties, therefore, is whether the payment by the defenders to the pursuer's sister relieves them in the circumstances of their obligation to pay to the pursuer the money which she had deposited; or, supposing the case clear of specialties in fact, the question expressed with its greatest generality is, whether a depositor in a savings bank or the bank loses by a forgery.

“The pursuer appeals to the common law, the defenders to regulations of the Treasury and rules of the bank, which are, they say, authoritative, and to which, they say, the pursuer has assented, and by which they are—as they maintain—protected. That is the very important and general question raised in this case.

“But there is a preliminary question stated in the defenders' first plea that the action is barred by the arbitration clauses in the Acts of Parliament.

“The primary provision on which the defenders found is section 48 of the Act 26 and 27 Vict. c. 87, which provides,—‘If any dispute arises between the trustees and the managers of any savings bank, and any individual depositor therein, or any executor, administrator, next of kin, or creditor or assignee of any depositor who may become bankrupt or insolvent, or any person claiming to be such executor, administrator, next of kin, creditor, or assignee, or to be entitled to any money deposited in such savings bank, then, and in every such case, the matter in dispute shall be referred in writing to the barrister-at-law appointed under the said hereby repealed Acts, or this Act . . . whose determination shall be binding . . . on all parties, and shall be final to all intents and purposes, without any appeal.’

“This enactment still continues to be law, except that by the operation of the Acts 39 and 40 Vict. c. 52, section 2, subsection 1, and the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 60, section 4, the referee in ques-

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The defenders were precluded from pleading the arbitration clause of the Act in answer to the pursuer's claim, in respect that they denied that she was a depositor. The character of her claim was to be judged of as at the date of the action, and at that date they denied that she had any deposit in the bank. The question turned upon the construction of such statutes as 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 40, which dealt with the approval of regulations made for trustee savings banks, and was therefore for the Court, and not the arbiter, to decide.²

tions arising in Scotland is now, instead of the 'barrister-at-law,' the Assistant Registrar of Friendly Societies for Scotland, who must be 'an Advocate, Writer to the Signet, or Solicitor, of not less than seven years' standing' (section 10, subsection 3).

"The language of this enactment appears to be very distinct, and I have not been able to see how its application can be avoided, or how it can be denied that the question raised by this action is a dispute between the trustees and an individual depositor in the bank, who claims to be entitled to 'money deposited in the bank.' The words seem to apply exactly.

"I do not understand that the application of the statute, and of the above section of it, to the defenders' bank is disputed, but the pursuer has pleaded that the question is not a dispute within the meaning of the statutes. This plea was supported mainly by reference to the case of Symington's Executor v. Galashiels Co-operative Store Company, Limited, 13th January 1894, 21 R. 371, but I think the case inapplicable.

"The question in that case arose under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 45). The action was by the executor-dative of a deceased member for recovery of a sum claimed as due to the deceased, and the defence was that the sum claimed had been paid to certain of the next of kin of the deceased. It was considered that the defence imported a denial that the pursuer had the rights of a member, and it was held that a clause providing that disputes between members—or those suing in right of members—and the society should be referred to a committee of the society, was inapplicable, because, while the statute provided a domestic tribunal for ascertaining what the rights of members were, it did not empower the committee to determine whether a party was or was not a member. That was held to be a proper question for the Court. It might perhaps be said that the Court, after deciding that the pursuer was entitled to the rights of a member, went on to determine what these rights were, but upon that point there was truly no dispute.

"The pursuer sought to assimilate that case to this by representing that, as in that case, the defence imported a denial that the pursuer had the rights of a member, so here the defence imported a denial that the pursuer was a depositor. But I think the cases are altogether different. The relations of a member of an industrial and provident society to the society are wholly different from those of a depositor to a savings bank. The latter is not a member of the bank, but only an ordinary creditor, subject to certain conditions. There is nothing of the nature of a domestic tribunal provided, but only a comprehensive clause of reference; and I think it is a mere play upon words to say that when a savings bank, in an action brought by a party as a depositor, pleads that the money in question has been paid, that is to be held as a denial that the party is a depositor. In this case the pur-

Savings Bank.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a very clear case. The Act of Parliament says that if any dispute shall arise between the trustees and managers of any savings bank, that dispute (I summarise the provision) shall be settled by arbitration. This is a dispute between the trustees on the one hand, and on the other, a person who had a deposit of between £60 and £70 in this savings bank, and the matter in dispute is whether £50 of that deposit was rightly or wrongly paid to someone else.

If the matter had stood on that footing, there would have been no room for the very slender answer to the plea of the arbitration clause now given. That answer is this :—The pursuer says, “De facto, I am not now a depositor, because I have now no money in the bank.” First of all, let us see how the facts stand. I take the pursuer’s own record, and I find that an action had been intimated prior to the withdrawal by the pursuer of the £14 odds which remained on the deposit-account after the £50 now in dispute had been paid away. And therefore this dispute, which had arisen on the 24th June, was a dispute not as to whether the pursuer was or was not a depositor, but simply whether an item of £50 was a good debit entry in her account as a depositor, or not. Therefore it is not the fact that this dispute when it arose was a dispute between the trustees and a person who was not a depositor.

suer does not aver that the withdrawal of the £50 took from her the position of a depositor, and, in point of fact, it did not, for her pass-book shews that £14, 19s. 4d. was left deposited to her credit in the bank.

“It was maintained that the question here raised was not the sort of question referred to in the arbitration clauses; and here again reference was made to the case of Symington, in which an opinion to that effect was expressed on the bench in relation to the question there raised. There the tribunal was so constituted as not to be, in the opinion of the Court, adapted to the trial of a question which was thought to involve the construction of the statute, and also so constituted as apparently to make the society judge in its own cause. But in this case the arbiter—the Assistant Registrar—is presumably, in the strictest sense, impartial; and it would be absurd to represent that an official, whose statutory qualifications involve legal training and practice, is to be presumed unqualified to construe the statute which he is appointed to administer.

“If a dispute as to whether money deposited was paid or not be not a dispute with a depositor comprehended in the clause about arbitration, it is difficult to understand what sort of dispute with a depositor would be comprehended.

“It may seem a little startling that so general a question as this, whether a savings bank or its depositor should suffer from a forgery, should be withdrawn from the cognisance of the ordinary Courts, so that apparently it is a question which can never be authoritatively determined; still, that appears to be the effect of the statute, the terms of which are too plain to admit of question; and, in my opinion, they necessitate the conclusion that the question here raised must be submitted to the Assistant Registrar.

“I think the policy of the Act was to protect savings banks and their depositors from the cost of ordinary litigation, and to provide that disputes between them should not come into Court at all; and it seems to me that that policy would be best carried out by dismissing this action. Still, if the parties think it better that it should remain in Court to abide the issue of a reference to the Registrar, I do not object to sist it.

“Seeing that I am thus debarred from deciding the question raised, and that question falls to be decided by the Assistant Registrar, it would be obviously improper to indicate any opinion on the merits.”

But I go further, and I say that even supposing that this payment of £50 would have exhausted her account, still this would be a question between the trustees and a depositor. Consider the arguments on each side. The pursuer's case would then be:—"I deposited my £50. You have paid it away wrongly, and I hold that in your books I am a depositor for that amount." The answer for the trustees is, not that they dispute that this lady is entitled to the rights of a depositor, but that these rights have been satisfied; for they say that their payment to another person is as good as their payment to her. That is a totally different kind of question from those which arose in the cases of Symington,¹ Prentice,² and Willis.³ To take specimen passages from Prentice,—"If the matter in controversy is whether the party is a member or not, that clearly is not a matter of internal arrangement" (per Lindley, J.). Lord Coleridge said substantially the same, and Lord Esher, then Mr Justice Brett, said,—“A dispute as to whether a party is a member or not is clearly not a dispute between the society and the plaintiff as a member.” The present case is on a totally different footing. It seems to me that it is a mere accident in the case that from supervening events this pursuer has no money in the bank on her account. The question must be determined as at the time at which the dispute arose, but, further, if the payment in question had exhausted her account, the question is still one between depositor and trustees or managers.

Melrose v.
Trustees for Savings Bank.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It is impossible to read the summons without seeing that it is a claim by a depositor for repayment of a sum wrongly paid away by the bank. The only question is whether the sum was properly paid away or not. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that, if a dispute as to whether money deposited has been paid or not be not a dispute with a depositor comprehended in the clause about arbitration, it is difficult to understand what sort of a dispute with a depositor would be comprehended.

I quite agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, and think it a clear case.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree. I think there is no doubt that the question in dispute is referred to arbitration.

LORD KINNAR.—I entirely agree. The pursuer avers that she deposited certain sums in the defenders' bank. She is suing on the contract of deposit, and the only defence is founded on what the defenders allege to be the terms of the contract. The dispute is as to what are the rights of the parties to the contract of deposit inter se. I agree in an observation of the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer's argument that she is not a depositor in the defenders' bank, because, as they say, the money deposited has been paid, resolves itself into a mere play upon words.

I have no doubt whatever that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

THE GLASGOW IRON AND STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Salvesen.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Railway—Injury to servant from defective plant of third party.—The children of a labourer, in the employment of the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, who was killed while working as a platelayer on a railway siding situated within the steel company's premises, brought an action of damages against the steel company and the Caledonian Railway Company. They averred that the accident had been caused by a defect in the points, which had thrown several waggons off the line during a shunting operation; that the lines, and the engine and waggons which were using them at the time of the accident, belonged to the railway company; that the lines had been kept up by the steel company for at least ten years, and that both the defenders were responsible for their upkeep; that it was the duty of the steel company to have seen that the points could shut, and that the rails, &c., were in good condition, before putting the deceased to work at or near them.

Held (1) that there was a relevant case against the railway company, but (2) that no relevant case was stated against the steel company, there being nothing in the pursuers' averments to shew that any duty to see to the maintenance of the line attached to these defenders.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

THIS was an action of damages brought in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton by Peter Smyth and others, the children of the deceased Andrew Smyth, against the Caledonian Railway Company and the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company. The action against the steel company was laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act.

The pursuers averred;—On 5th September 1896 Andrew Smyth was killed by accident on the line of the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company, while in the employment of the other defenders, the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company. On said date Andrew Smyth was working as a platelayer under the orders of one of the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company's foremen, on a railway siding situated within the gateway which formed the entrance to the Steel Company's works, his duty being to keep the lines in order within the works of the Steel Company. (Cond. 4) At the time of the accident a row of waggons was being shunted on the siding within the Steel Company's works. "Said engine, waggons, and lines were the property of the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company, but both of said defenders are responsible for the upkeep and proper conduct of said lines and the traffic thereon." (Cond. 5) During the shunting operations several waggons left the line, with the result that the pursuers' father was crushed between one of them and a stationary waggon on another line. (Cond. 6) "The said accident was caused through the fault of the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company, or those for whom they are responsible, in respect that the switch-points and switch-boxes were defective, and of old material and pattern, and worn out, the switch-points being so loose that they could not be shut, and the switch-boxes broken and useless, and worked with a piece of scrap iron, and the rails bent and pieces broken off them. The sleepers also were very badly ballasted. It was their duty to have had said points so that they could shut, and said switch-boxes, rails, and sleepers of good material and in good condition, and periodically overhauled, and to have had said switch-boxes worked with a lever. This they culpably failed to do. By an examination the defects would easily have been seen. It is usual, necessary, and safe to have such points so that they can shut, and said boxes, rails, and sleepers of good material and in good condition, and periodically overhauled, and also said boxes worked with a lever. . . ." (Cond. 7) "The said accident was also caused through the fault of the defenders the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, or of their superintendent, for whom they are responsible, in culpably failing to see that the said points and switch-boxes were defective, the switch-points being so loose that they could not be shut, and the switch-boxes broken and useless, and worked with a piece of scrap iron, and the rails bent and pieces broken off them. The sleepers were also very badly ballasted. The defenders the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company have kept up these lines for ten years at least." It was their duty to have seen that said points could shut, and that said boxes, rails, and sleepers were in good condition, before putting deceased to work at or near them, [and] to have had said switch-boxes worked with a lever. . . . It is usual, necessary, and safe to have such points so that they can shut, and said boxes, rails, and sleepers periodically overhauled and in good condition, [and] to have said switch-boxes worked with a lever."

Smyth v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

The defenders the Railway Company admitted that the shunting operations which resulted in the accident were being carried on by their servants.

Both defenders pleaded that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant.

On 23d December 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) conjoined the action with three other cases arising out of the same accident, and allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuers having appealed for jury trial, the defenders objected to the relevancy.

Argued for the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company;—The ground of action was the defective condition of the points on a line which was alleged to be the property of these defenders. But the mere averment that they owned the line was not enough. To make the case against them relevant, it was necessary also to aver that they were in occupation of the line. There was no relevant averment to this effect. On the contrary, it was averred that the line had been maintained for ten years by the Steel Company, and the record read as a whole implied that the other defenders were in occupation of it. If so, the liability must rest with them, and not with the Railway Company.¹

Argued for the defenders the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company;—There was no relevant case against these defenders. The accident was averred to have taken place on the Railway Company's line, and there was no averment that the Steel Company were in occupation of that line as tenants. On the contrary, it was averred that at the time of the accident the line was occupied by a train belonging to the Railway Company and controlled by their servants. The gate was to exclude the public, and its existence could not justify the inference that the line was given over to the occupation of the Steel Company. It was said, no doubt, that the Steel Company had kept up the line for a number of years, but it was not averred that they were under any contract to the other defenders to do so. The duty of maintenance therefore remained with the owners of the line.¹ Even if there had been a relevant averment of a contract whereby the Steel Company undertook to keep up the line, that would not have made the action relevant against these defenders, although such a contract might have given the Railway Company a right of relief against them.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was clear that one or other of the defenders was responsible for the defective condition of the line. The pursuers could not be expected to know their exact relations to one another in regard to the line, but in the circumstances they had made averments sufficient to constitute a relevant case against each. They were entitled therefore to have the case against both defenders sent to trial. The cases of *Robinson*² and the *Greenock Sacking Company*³ had been sent to trial, and decided after proof, and a similar course had been followed in other cases of the kind.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have to consider this case purely upon the pursuers' record, and that being so, I am of opinion that there is a well-laid case against the Caledonian Railway Company, but not against the Glasgow Steel Company.

The pursuers, having called into Court both these parties, proceed to narrate the duties incumbent on either of them, and the fault attached to either. They do so necessarily in a continuous narrative, because their claim is that both are liable.

An examination of the record has satisfied me that prima facie their case lies against the Caledonian Railway. In the first place, the accident occurred in this way—there was a failure on the part of the switch apparatus to operate effectively. Now, the railway and the switch apparatus are, according to the pursuers, the property of the Caledonian Railway. Further, the operations which miscarried were operations with the plant of the Caledonian Railway, and conducted by the servants of the Caledonian Railway. All that goes far to shew prima facie a case against the Caledonian Railway, and in order to dismiss from consideration this, the less difficult part of the case, I may say that I consider the averments good against the Caledonian Railway. They may be more reserved and less explicit than they would have been had the draftsman not been influenced by an arrière pensée arising from the other claim; but still they are sufficient.

When I turn to the case against the Glasgow Steel Company, I enter upon an entirely different character of statement. The key-note there is, that while the Caledonian Railway are the proprietors of this railway, and the using company, the duty assigned to the Steel Company in condescendence 7 is merely this,—that, in as much as this railway passes through their works, and it may be said is used for the transit of their traffic, there is a resulting duty on them to supervise and examine the proceedings of the Caledonian Railway and their plant and apparatus. That is the essential part of condescendence 7, and by way of criticism upon the article it is instructive to note that the isolated sentence which introduced another element was in point of fact inserted, not at the original composition of this indictment against the company, but because the exigencies of debate suggested that it might be as well at least to adumbrate another view of the subject.

Smyth v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Now, the importance of that statement must be judged by its relation to the context, and it seems to me to have no more importance than belongs to an anecdote or illustration of the text. I could quite have understood its being said,—“I, the pursuer, was a plate-layer engaged in the maintenance of these lines, and the keeping up of the apparatus, and the footing on which I was employed was this, that the company, my employers, were the maintainers and as such specially charged with responsibility.” But nothing is said to connect this statement of practice with the essential charge against the company, which is, not that they were bound to do the thing, but to see that it was well done. Now, can it be held that it results from the averred facts, which are these,—that this railway was the property of the Caledonian Railway, passing doubtless through the works of the other company, but still run and managed by the Caledonian Railway—can it be held that there results from these facts an obligation on the Glasgow Steel Company, in a question with their employees, to see that the Caledonian Railway do their work properly? The argument would be equally applicable to the case where there was a mere local proximity of the works to the railway. Suppose a manufacturer had his establishment close to the railway, so close that an accident with great impulse might drive waggons on to his land, would he be liable if there were an accident due to the fault of the railway company’s servants merely because he did not go into their premises to see if they were doing their duty? I cannot distinguish that case from the present, and the conclusion I have come to is, that the case against the Glasgow Steel Company is irrelevant, and that the action must be dismissed against them.

One feels the difficulty in which a pursuer is placed who is not certain as to which of two parties is liable to him, but I am afraid that he must by inquiry and investigation outside the Courts make up his mind before he comes into Court, or at all events that his difficulties will not entitle the Court to consider the record on any other footing than that of giving due weight to the statements made throughout it, and of considering whether there is a distinct and relevant statement made against each defender. On this ground I think that the Glasgow Steel Company are entitled to have the action dismissed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The case against the Caledonian Railway Company does not appear to me to present any difficulty, for this action arose from certain waggons in a train leaving the rails and causing the death of the person whose representatives are now before us. The accident is attributed by the pursuers to defects in the permanent way. Prima facie, the duty of maintaining the permanent way is one cast upon the owners of the line, the Caledonian Railway Company, who, being a company incorporated by statute for the purpose of managing a line with a view to profit, are bound to keep it in good order, whether they use it themselves or employ others to work it for them. It appears to me, therefore, that a statement that the accident was due to defects in the way is prima facie a relevant statement of liability against the Caledonian Railway Company. Now, in the fourth article of the condescendence it is stated that the engine, waggons, and line were the property of the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company, and that is admitted. There is no defence by the Railway Company that the permanent way belongs in property to any other person.

When we come to the case against the Glasgow Steel Company I agree that there is no relevant case against them, for it would be necessary to such a case to shew in what manner they were in fault with reference to the condition of the way. It would be necessary to aver that, as a matter of contract or otherwise, the Steel Company had undertaken the upkeep of the points, and had failed in their duty, but I cannot find such a statement in the record. The bare statement that they had maintained the line for ten years is not sufficient to raise such a liability, for it is consistent with the theory that they maintained it as agents of the Caledonian Railway Company. It follows, in my opinion, that the action against the Steel Company ought to be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the actions as laid against the defenders the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, Limited, are irrelevant, and dismiss the same as laid against the said Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, Limited: Find the four sets of pursuers liable to the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, Limited, in expenses both in this and in the Sheriff Court, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax, and to report: Quoad ultra approve of the issues No. 18 of process as adjusted at the bar: Appoint the same to be the issues for the trial of the cause, and decern."

1st DIVISION.

THE General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland appealed to the Commissioners of Income-tax against an assessment for inhabited house duty on £1105, made on them for the year ending 24th May 1896, as occupiers of the Free Church Assembly Hall and of the Free Church College Buildings, Edinburgh, and claimed exemption on the ground that the premises “are not inhabited houses, and not within the provisions of the Acts, or if they are, that they are within the exemptions expressed in the Acts.”*

In support of the assessment the Surveyor of Taxes contended that the buildings consisted of “halls and offices” in the sense of rule V. of schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, and that subsection 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, did not apply, in respect that the occupiers did not carry on in the premises any trade or business by which they sought a livelihood or profit.

The Commissioners refused the appeal, and the appellants craved a case.

The case stated, inter alia;—“1. The appellants are owners and occupiers of the buildings which form the subject of the appeal. 2. The buildings in question enclose three sides of a quadrangle on Mound Place, Edinburgh. On the north and west sides of the quadrangle stands what is known as the Free Church College, a building of four storeys, containing on the sunk floor cellarage and accommodation for the heating apparatus; on the ground floor a janitor's dwelling-house, two class-rooms or halls, with professors' retiring-rooms attached, and a hall in which the Senatus and the College Committee of the General Assembly meet; on the first floor four

* The duties on inhabited houses are assessable in virtue of the House-Tax Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36), and of the schedule annexed thereto, which grants to the Crown a duty on “every inhabited dwelling-house which, with the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of twenty pounds or upwards by the year.”

Section 2 of the Act enacts that all powers, provisions, rules, and regulations contained in or enacted by former Acts with reference to the duties on inhabited dwelling-houses according to the value thereof, as set forth in the schedule marked B annexed to the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, shall apply in the assessing, raising, levying, and collecting the duties granted by the said House-Tax Act, 1851.

Rule V. of the said schedule marked B enacts that “every hall or office whatever belonging to any person or persons, or to any body or bodies politic or corporate, or to any company, that are or may be lawfully charged with the payment of any other taxes or parish rates, shall be subject to the duties hereby made payable as inhabited houses; and the person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, or company to whom the same shall belong, shall be charged as the occupier or occupiers thereof.”

Subsection 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 15), enacts,—“Every house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, shall be exempted from the duties by the said Commissioners, upon proof of the facts to their satisfaction, and this exemption shall take effect although a servant or other person may dwell in such house or tenement for the protection thereof.”

class-rooms and four retiring-rooms, a common hall for the use of students, where newspapers, books, &c., are placed, and where, since the institution of dinners for the students some years ago, the dinners are served, a large library hall and other library accommodation; and on the second floor other two class-rooms, with two retiring-rooms, a gymnasium, and a museum. 3. The buildings known as the Assembly Hall, which stand on the south side of the enclosed quadrangle, contain a large hall, a smaller hall, which during the meetings of a General Assembly is used as a refreshment-room, and several retiring-rooms and lavatories. 4. A gateway from Mound Place leads through the northern side of the college buildings to the quadrangle, whence access is had by separate doors to the Assembly Hall and the college buildings. The janitor's dwelling-house on the ground floor, which is entered by a door within the gateway, and forms an integral part of the main building, now communicates internally with the sunk floor, which contains the furnaces, heating apparatus, and cellarage, and thence with the whole premises assessed. As the buildings were originally erected, there was no internal communication between the janitor's house and the remainder of the buildings charged. . . . The communication was opened for the convenience of the janitor in attending to the furnaces, and to prevent the necessity of his going from the house through the quadrangle and then into the cellar. The heating apparatus is for the college only. The gateway leading to the janitor's dwelling-house and to the quadrangle is furnished with an iron gate, which is locked at night, and thus shuts in the whole buildings, and establishes internal communication throughout the whole premises charged to duty. 5. The Assembly Hall was built expressly as a place of meeting for the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, which meets annually in the month of May, and sits about ten days, and for the meetings of the Commission of the General Assembly, which are held about three times a year. The hall is occasionally let for meetings of a religious, semi-religious, or charitable character, or for temperance meetings, when a charge of from £2, 2s. to £3, 3s. a day is made for its use, but the fees charged for admission to the meetings of the Assembly and the charges for the occasional use of the hall do not more than cover expenses. 6. The Free Church College is what is known in Scotland as a divinity hall, and it is in this sense that the word "college" is used in this case, and is intended primarily for the training of candidates for the ministry of the Free Church of Scotland, when they have completed their undergraduate course at one or other of the national universities. Other students who desire to make themselves proficient in the subjects taught therein may be and are admitted. . . . 8. Fees were paid by the students, but the revenue from fees did not nearly cover the working expenses. . . . 12. The College and Assembly Hall are both charged to poor and school rates for the year to which the assessment to inhabited house duty applies. These rates were paid under protest."

Argued for the appellants;—(1) To render buildings assessable to inhabited house duty under the Act of 1851, they must not only be "inhabited," but must be "dwelling-houses,"—that is, they must be houses in which people lived not only by day but by night. It had been so held in England in the case of Riley,¹ and the later English decision¹ founded on by the Inland Revenue really supported that case. This view of the statute was supported by a consideration of rule V. of schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 55, for the inference from the special enactment there made in regard to halls and offices was, that without such special enactment they would not have been subject to the tax. The Scots decisions² were to the contrary, but the point seems never to have been directly raised in argument. (2) Nor did the buildings fall within the description of "halls or offices" in the sense of rule V. of schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55. That rule contemplated business premises, and premises ejusdem generis. Even if the Assembly Hall were a "hall" in the sense of the rule, the college, which consisted of a series of classrooms, was evidently not. (3) Though the buildings were not primarily occupied for profit, profits were taken, and this was enough to entitle the appellants to the exemption conferred by subsection 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.

Argued for the Surveyor of Taxes;—(1) The duty imposed by the Act of 1851 applied to houses occupied in different ways, and not only to those in which people lived. The point was foreclosed by decisions of the Scots Court, in which it had been raised and decided.³ The only case contrary to these decisions was the English case of Riley,⁴ but the judgment of Baron Kelly in that case had not been supported or approved in any later case.⁵ The Act 57 Geo. III. cap. 25, which exempted houses occupied solely for purposes of trade from inhabited house duty, interpreted the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, as referring to all inhabited houses, whatever the nature of the inhabitation.⁶ (2) The buildings here in question were clearly "halls or offices" in the sense of rule V. of schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55. (3) The exempting clause of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act did not apply, the buildings not being occupied for the purposes of a business or calling by which the occupiers sought a livelihood or profit.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion the Commissioners are right, but my judgment is rested solely on the 5th rule of schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55. I think that these buildings consist of "halls" in the sense of that rule, and they are in fact (and without challenge) charged with the payment of poor and school rates (the requirement of the rule being thus satisfied). The argument that they are not halls in the sense of the rule

General
Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v.
Inland
Revenue.

The appellants' claim for exemption under subsection 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, is untenable, for this plain reason, that the exemption is conferred on premises occupied for the purpose of any trade or business, or a profession or calling by which the occupiers seek a livelihood or profit. Now, it is set out in the case that the occupiers here are the General Trustees of the Free Church; they do not occupy the premises for any trade or business, or calling, or profession by which they seek a livelihood or profit.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I have never been able to see how the appellants got out of the clear enactment of rule 5 of schedule B of the Act of 48 Geo. III. The description given of the premises is halls and offices connected therewith, which is just the description of premises specified in rule 5; and then it is admitted in this case that the Assembly Hall and the halls in question are subject to the payment of rates, and that being so, I do not think it necessary to say more about the other grounds on which it is sought to assess these buildings.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

THE General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland appealed to the Commissioners of Income-Tax for the district of the City of Edinburgh against an assessment, under schedule A of the Property and Income-Tax Acts, on £665, duty £22, 3s. 4d., made on them for the year ended 5th April 1896, as occupiers of the Free Church or New College buildings, Edinburgh, and claimed exemption from the tax on the ground that the College, being a public school, was exempt under the Act, and referred to the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 61, schedule A, rule 6.*

of Scotland.

The following facts were set forth in the case:—"The College referred to is what is known in Scotland as a divinity hall—and it is in this sense that the word 'college' is used in this case—and is intended for the training of candidates for the ministry after they have completed their undergraduate course at one or other of the national universities, although other students who may be desirous to make themselves proficient in any of the subjects taught therein may be, and are, admitted. The ordinary theological curriculum consists of four years' regular attendance.

"The number of students who attended the said College in session 1895-96 was 131. Of these 86 were regular or ordinary students of the Free Church of Scotland, who before admission had produced all the certificates set forth in pages 9 and 10 of the College calendar of the Free Church of Scotland for session 1895-96, and who intended to follow the regular four years' course of study. The remaining 45, of whom 10 were Scotch, 4 English, 9 from Ireland, and 22 from the United States, Canada, and other places abroad, were irregular students, who had either not passed the necessary examinations, or who were not provided with the certificates required from regular or ordinary students or aspirants to the ministry of the Free Church, who did not intend to follow the regular four years' course of study. On a separate page of the enrolment-book there is also kept a register of students who are not provided with all the statutory certificates; such students may be allowed to take part in all the ordinary work of the classes they attend with the exception of the discourses required by the laws of the Church, but the course of study followed at the New College and the examinations which follow are regulated to meet the requirements of the ordinary Free Church students, and not those of the irregular students. . . . All students who enter the College are understood to profess their faith in Christ and their obedience to Him.

"Candidates for admission to the College as ordinary or regular students must have completed that attendance at a university which is required for graduation. . . .

"The matriculation fee for ordinary students of theology is 10s. a year, and the common fee £4, 10s. annually. Students from other countries and churches, counting their attendance as part of their curriculum, pay the same fees. Other English-speaking students pay in all £2, 10s. annually; students speaking foreign languages pay the matriculation fee only. The revenue of the College from students' fees for tuition and for use of library does not nearly cover the working expenses, the deficiency being made up by the income of endowments and from church-door collections."

The Surveyor argued ;—In no reasonable sense of the words could the theological college of a particular Church be called a “public school.” The words were peculiarly unfitted to describe the institution in question. The great majority of the students—all the regular students—were either graduates or had at least received a university education before they were admitted to the Hall, and the object of the institution was of a particular or professional character, being the training of candidates for the ministry of the Free Church of Scotland.

The respondents argued ;—The Free Church College was a theological school. It was also a public school. To entitle it to that character it was not essential that it should be open to the whole public ; it was enough that its object was to benefit a large class of persons.¹ Though fees were exacted it was not self-supporting, but was of the nature of a charitable trust.² To entitle a charitable trust to an allowance under the Act it was not necessary that its object should be the relief of the poor. It was sufficient that it promoted religion and learning, and so conferred a public benefit.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question is whether, in the sense of this statute, the Free Church College is a “public school.”

What, then, in the first place, is the institution now in question ? It is a theological college. The training offered is theological study, primarily at least as qualifying for the ministry of the Free Church. It is, therefore, an institution for professional training. But an establishment of that kind is necessarily one for young men, and not for boys ; and the period of life is shewn by the fact that the students must either be graduates of a university, or at least must have passed through a university course of arts, or have some similar equipment in literature and philosophy.

Well, now, in ordinary language, I do not think that anyone would call a theological college a public school. Of course the word “school,” in a literary, and still more in a rhetorical sense, is applied somewhat widely. But the phrase we have to construe is “public school,” and we have to look to the context of this statute. Now, the Act, in the immediately preceding paragraph, has occasion to consider universities and colleges for the purpose of conferring an exemption on certain colleges. But, if the argument of the respondents be sound, this was entirely superfluous, for, on their construction of the words “public school,” the colleges so exempted are at least as much “public schools” as is the Free Church College. Accordingly, the statute contains within itself clear evidence that the words “public school” are used with no greater latitude than is accorded to them by popular use.

I am for reversing the determination of the Commissioners and sustaining the assessment.

LORD ADAM.—I quite agree. I think it may not be easy to define what a public school is; it may not be difficult to say what is not a public school. In this particular case it appears to me, from the narrative given of the nature of this institution, that it is neither more nor less than an institution primarily for the purpose of educating or preparing persons for entering the Free Church as ministers. In my opinion that is not a public school in any sense, and I agree with your Lordship that there can be no doubt that this is not a public school in the sense of the Act.

Inland Revenue v. General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case raises only a question of construction of the exemptions in the taxing statute, and I agree with your Lordships that the Free Church College does not come within the exemptions relating to public schools. I do so on the ground that in the consideration of taxing statutes the true canon of construction is to take the primary sense of the words used, and that shade of meaning which is in ordinary use, avoiding all secondary meanings. The principle so applied is one which generally operates in favour of the tax-payer, because it avoids bringing in persons who might fall within the taxing words in a remote or analogical sense. But of course the principle must be applied consistently to clauses of exemption, as well as to taxing clauses; and in this case, confining the words "public school" to the meaning with which we are familiar in ordinary use, it leads to the failure of the plea of exemption which has been set forth.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

ROBERT PATERSON, innkeeper, Woodend Hotel, Holytown, died on 21st March 1882, survived by his widow, Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson, and by six children, three sons, James, Daniel, William, and three daughters, Mrs Mitchell, Mrs Burt, and Mrs Kilpatrick.

Mr Paterson left a trust-disposition and settlement and codicil, by which he conveyed his whole heritable and moveable estate to certain persons as trustees, among whom were his widow and his sons James and Daniel.

By the second purpose of his settlement Mr Paterson provided that his widow should enjoy the liferent of his whole trust-estate.

On the death of Mrs Paterson the trustees were directed (fourth purpose) to realise the moveable trust-estate, to make over certain heritable properties to his son James, and to pay certain legacies to his daughters, and (fifth purpose) to pay certain other legacies, including one of £1000 to his widow, and (sixth purpose) to hand over the residue of the estate to his son Daniel.

Power was given to the trustees to appoint one of their number to be factor on the trust-estate, and on 5th May 1882 they appointed Mr Daniel Paterson.

The truster's widow died on 19th July 1893, leaving a deed, dated 2d June 1893, in the following terms:—"I, . . . Do hereby revoke and cancel all deeds of settlement and codicils executed by me in their whole heads and clauses, and specially without prejudice to the said generality, a trust-disposition and settlement executed by me upon the 24th day of March 1884, and five codicils annexed thereto, dated respectively 8th May 1885, 7th January 1886, 22d September 1886, 19th December 1888, and 25th August 1892: And I declare it to be my wish that my estate shall at my death go to my nearest heirs whomsoever, the sums already advanced by me to any of the members of my family on loan or otherwise, namely, £530 to my son James Paterson, £400 to my son Daniel Paterson, and £400 to my daughter Mrs Jane Paterson or Kilpatrick, being treated as part of my estate, but without calculating interest thereon prior to the date of my death: And I appoint James Graham junior, writer in Glasgow, my sole executor, with power to him to charge the usual professional remuneration for his services."

Under the codicil of 22d September 1886 Daniel Paterson had been appointed residuary legatee.

Mr James Graham having declined to act as executor, Daniel Paterson and other children of Mrs Paterson were appointed executors-dative qua next of kin, but as they had conflicting interests, David Guthrie, C.A., Glasgow, was, on 7th November 1893, appointed judicial factor on Mrs Paterson's estate.

On 31st March 1894 Mr Guthrie raised an action of count and reckoning against James Paterson, Daniel Paterson, and others, the trustees under Mr Robert Paterson's settlement, as trustees and as individuals, and also against the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation.

The conclusions of the summons were (first) against Mr Paterson's trustees for an account "of their whole management and intromissions, and of the management and intromissions of the said Daniel Paterson as their factor, of and with the trust-estate of the said deceased Robert Paterson," and failing an account for payment of £13,000 to the pursuer as judicial factor; (second) against the defender Daniel Paterson for an account of his intromissions with the estate of Mrs Paterson, and failing an account for payment of £13,000;

"(third) it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the following bonds, bearing to be granted by the defenders the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation, in favour of the said Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson and the defender Daniel Paterson, and the survivor of them" (here followed an enumeration of five bonds), "and the whole moneys payable in respect of said bonds, were the property of the said Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson, and formed part of her estate at her death, on or about 19th July 1893, and now belong to the pursuer as judicial factor foresaid, and that the defender Daniel Paterson has no right or title to the said bonds or moneys payable in respect thereof, in virtue of the destination of the said bonds or otherwise, saving always the said defender's claim against the pursuer for an accounting for his share of the said bonds as one of the next of kin of the said deceased Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson"; (fourth) for delivery of the bonds to the pursuer; (fifth) failing delivery, for adjudication of the bonds; and (sixth) for decree for expenses against "the defender Daniel Paterson in any event, and the other defenders only in the event of their appearing and opposing the conclusions hereof."

Paterson's Judicial Factor v.
Paterson's
Trustees.

Defences were lodged for Mr Paterson's trustees and for Daniel Paterson.

The pursuer, after stating the facts before narrated, which were not disputed, averred that Mr Paterson left moveable estate amounting to £5920—the defenders admitted £3856—and various heritable properties, the rental of which was about £450—the defenders admitted £323—that after the appointment of Daniel Paterson as factor "the trustees negligently and wrongfully failed to exercise any supervision over the defender Daniel Paterson's actings as factor, or to obtain from him any accounts of his intromissions with the trust-estate. The said defender also did not account for his said intromissions to his mother Mrs Paterson."

The pursuer further averred;—"A part of Mrs Paterson's estate consists of the bonds by the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation mentioned in the summons. The consideration money for the said bonds belonged to Mrs Paterson, and the defender Daniel Paterson invested it, without any authority from Mrs Paterson, in bonds payable to her and to himself and to the survivor. In these circumstances the third, fourth, and fifth conclusions of the summons are rendered necessary."*

The defenders Mr Paterson's trustees stated, inter alia, that by arrangement with the trustees, and by the special desire of the life-rentrix, Daniel Paterson did not pay the sums collected by him from the trust properties to the trustees, but paid them direct to the life-rentrix, and that the net balance due by the trustees was £5, 19s. 1½d., which they offered to pay. They also produced a statement, with the relative vouchers and books containing receipts under Mrs Paterson's hands for payments made to her, of their intromissions with the trust-estate down to Whitsunday 1893.

* The bonds bore that "the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation, in consideration of the sum of ——— pounds sterling, paid to them by Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson, widow, and Daniel Paterson, both residing at Woodend, Holytown Bridge, do hereby bind themselves to pay to the said Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson and Daniel Paterson, and the survivor of them, and their, her, or his executors, administrators, or assigns, the principal sum of ——— pounds."

Factor v.

Trustees.

The defender Daniel Paterson stated that he had kept regular accounts of his intromissions as factor; that he was never called upon to account to the trustees until January 1892, when Messrs J. & A. Graham, as acting for the trustees, asked him to produce his vouchers, and that he had at once done so.

He further stated that the sums contained in the Clyde Navigation bonds belonged to and were contributed in equal shares by his mother and himself, and that his mother was well aware of the terms of the destinations contained in the bonds.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In respect that the defenders the trustees of Robert Paterson have failed to account for their intromissions with the trust-estate either to Mrs Paterson or to the pursuer as judicial factor on her estate, the pursuer is entitled to decree of count, reckoning, and payment, in terms of the first conclusions of the summons; (2) the defender Daniel Paterson having failed to account to Mrs Paterson, or to the pursuer, for his intromissions with her estate, the pursuer is entitled to decree of count, reckoning, and payment, in terms of the second conclusions of the summons; (3) the said bonds being the property of the deceased Mrs Paterson, and the defender Daniel Paterson having had no authority to insert the said destination in his own favour, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator, delivery, and adjudication, as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders the trustees pleaded that the action was unnecessary.

The defender Daniel Paterson pleaded, inter alia;—(5) On a sound construction of the terms of the five bonds mentioned in the summons, the pursuer is not entitled to declarator as concluded for, and the defender ought to be assoilzied quoad the third conclusion; (7) so long as the said bonds stand unreduced they are, on a sound construction of their terms, the property of this defender by virtue of the destinations therein.

After sundry procedure, in the course of which the trustees of consent lodged a further account of charge and discharge, and objections thereto and answers were also lodged, the Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof before answer of their averments on record and in the objections and answers.

Proof was led. Evidence bearing upon the Clyde Navigation bonds shewed that Mrs Paterson had authorised the bonds to be taken in the terms which they bore. Quoad ultra the result of the proof sufficiently appears from the findings in the interlocutor of 30th April 1896 after mentioned, and the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord McLaren.

On 30th April 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor containing, inter alia, the following findings:—"Finds that (subject to provision for the safety of certain legacies payable at the death of the widow and liferentrix, all of which have been duly paid), the administration of the estate was, at the request of the liferentrix, left in the hands of herself and her son, the individual defender—they being both of them trustees, and the individual defender being residuary legatee, and the arrangement being that the individual defender should be factor for the trust without remuneration, and should account to the liferentrix direct for such part of the income of the trust as was not drawn by the liferentrix herself: Finds that this arrangement was carried out, and that the liferentrix herself received possession of the deposit-receipts, and afterwards of the coupons of the Glasgow and Clyde bonds, and also obtained possession of the stock in trade left by the deceased or the proceeds thereof, and that she made no complaint during her life that the defender, as factor foresaid, had not fully accounted to her for the rents, interests, and others which he collected on behalf of the trustees: Finds that in these circumstances the pursuer, as now representing the liferentrix, has no claim against the trustees for accounting, or at all events for further accounts and vouchers than those already produced: Finds further that, in so far as the pursuer has a claim of accounting against the individual defender as factor for the trustees, the accounts produced are correct and sufficiently vouched, except in so far as they take credit for payments made by the factor on account of the liferentrix as an individual, and not in connection with the trust-estate. . . . Finds further that, while the said defender assisted his mother in the management of her money matters, he did so not on the footing of any employment as factor or agent, or of any obligation to keep accounts and preserve vouchers, but as a son assisting his mother with whom he lived, and as his sister Mrs Kilpatrick had done prior to her marriage: Finds separately that the pursuer has failed to prove that the liferentrix was dissatisfied with the individual defender's actings in her affairs, or that she desired or expected any accounting from him beyond what she received: Therefore repels the objections stated by the pursuer to the defenders' accounts, whether the said accounts are regarded as the trustees' accounts, or accounts of the individual defender as factor to the trust, but excepting and reserving always any question which may be raised as to any items of discharge in the said accounts unconnected with the trust-estate, and consisting of disbursements made by the defender on account of his mother as an individual; with regard to said items, appoints parties to be further heard: And with respect to the Clyde Trust bonds for £1950 mentioned in the third conclusion of the summons, payable to the deceased Mrs Paterson (the liferentrix), and the individual defender and the survivor of them, finds it not proved that the said bonds were the sole property of the said Mrs Paterson: Finds further, that it is not proved that the destination therein contained was inserted without Mrs Paterson's authority: Finds that, in the circumstances disclosed in evidence, the presumption is that she knew and authorised the terms of said destination: Finds that said destination operated as a bequest of Mrs Paterson's share of said bonds to the individual defender, and that the same was not revoked by the general revocation contained in the deed executed by Mrs Paterson on 2d June 1893: Therefore assoilzies the individual defender from the third, fourth, and fifth conclusions of the summons, and decerns; appoints the case to be enrolled for further procedure in order to the determination of the matters above reserved, and meantime reserves all question of expenses.*

* "OPINION.—The findings of the above interlocutor perhaps sufficiently explain themselves, but the Lord Ordinary may say in a word, with respect to the matters of fact to which the proof was mainly directed, that he prefers the evidence of the defenders to that of the pursuers. In particular, he is satisfied that the late Mrs Paterson was perfectly capable of understanding and looking closely after her pecuniary rights, and that she did so, and that if her son Daniel got more from her during her life than her other children, he did so because such was her wish. The Lord Ordinary does not believe that she was ill-used by Daniel. Neither does he believe that from fear or otherwise she allowed him to appropriate her means. That she placed confidence in him he does not doubt, but that he abused that confidence, and that she acquiesced in his doing so, looking forward to a reckoning at some future time or at her death, the Lord Ordinary does not believe.

On 9th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the sums taken credit for by the factor as disbursed on account of the liferentrix as an individual, and which fall in this accounting to be disallowed, amount to £139, 0s. 6½d.; . . . therefore decerns against the defenders Paterson's Trustees and the defender Daniel Paterson for payment of the said sum of £139, 0s. 6½d.; . . . Quoad ultra assolzies the whole defenders from the conclusions of the summons, so far as not already disposed of, and decerns; and having heard counsel on the question of expenses, finds the pursuer liable in expenses to the defenders Paterson's trustees; finds him also liable in expenses to the defender Daniel Paterson, subject to modification, reserving as to amount of modification until after the account is taxed. . . ."

"With respect to the separate matter of the Clyde bonds, the Lord Ordinary has had some difficulty. He finds nothing in the evidence to displace the presumption that the bonds belonged to the mother and son jointly,—the fact that the contributions were unequal being quite consistent with that conclusion. But he has had doubt whether there was sufficient evidence to prove or presume that the destination to the survivor was authorised by the deceased; and he has also had doubt whether the deed of revocation of June 1893 might not be held to strike at special bequests of the kind in question. On consideration, however, he has not seen his way to give effect to these doubts. There is some direct evidence that the old lady knew the terms of the bonds. Looking to the terms of her settlement as then existing, the destination therein expressed in Daniel's favour was not unnatural, and it is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, improbable that a person of Mrs Paterson's disposition would have remained or could well have been kept ignorant of the terms of the documents which represented so large a part of her capital. As to the deed of revocation, whatever may have been the intention, the language is, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, too restricted to cover the bequest in effect constituted by the special destination in the bonds."

* "OPINION.—I have no doubt that the pursuer must be held liable, and personally liable, in the bulk of the expenses of this litigation. The only question is as to modification.

"As against the trustees, I see no ground for modifying the expenses. I think the litigation has proceeded on wrong lines from the first, and I also think that the pursuer, if he had exercised reasonable caution and had taken reasonable means of informing himself of the facts of the case, would have been less ready to launch into a litigation which has so far proved so unfortunate, the more especially as it involved the making of serious charges against respectable people—charges which I think ought not to have been made on slender grounds. Therefore I have no difficulty about the pursuer's liability for the expenses of the trustees. The trustees, so far as I can see, do not appear to have been at all in default. Two of their number, the widow (the pursuer's author) and her son Daniel, the individual defender, had (barring certain legacies which were well secured) the whole interest under the trust. The one was liferentrix, the other was residuary legatee, and the two lived together, and during the whole period of the trust the arrangement on which they and the trustees acted was that Daniel, who was at his mother's instance appointed factor to the trust, should manage everything and account to her direct. I cannot think that

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer when appointed No. 91. judicial factor was in entire ignorance of the position of matters. He was entitled and bound to call the trustees to account. The appointment of Daniel Paterson had in no way relieved them of the duty Feb. 4, 1897. of closely supervising the administration of the trust-estate. It was Paterson's Judicial Factor v. Paterson's Trustees. their duty to require a regular audit from their factor.¹ It was really due to the conduct of the trustees that the action was necessary, and they should be found liable in expenses, or neither party should be found liable in expenses. In any view the pursuer should only be found liable qua judicial factor.² It was the factor's duty to Mrs Paterson's next of kin to have the matter cleared up. A fortiori the pursuer was entitled to his expenses against Daniel Paterson, who had failed to keep regular accounts. It might be that in the result no serious deficiency had been ascertained, but looking to the absence of vouchers and the difficulty connected with the Clyde Navigation bonds, proof was necessary. The Lord Ordinary was wrong on the question of the Clyde Navigation bonds. In point of fact the money lent was Mrs Paterson's, and the defender had failed to prove that she had this was an unusual or unreasonable arrangement, and I think the pursuer, whether or not he had at first evidence that such an arrangement had been in fact made, had at least the statement to that effect of the trustees' agents, Messrs Graham, and ought at least to have considered whether the usage and practice of the trust, acquiesced in by his author, the liferentrix, during so long a period, admitted of any other interpretation. But the factor does not seem to have so thought. He seems to have considered that the trustees were nevertheless bound to produce accounts of charge and discharge formally vouched—such accounts as they would have had to produce at the call of a beneficiary who had left the whole administration in their hands, and to whom they had never accounted from first to last. That position was, in my judgment, entirely untenable, and the factor, in bringing this action against the trustees, did so at his own risk, and must take the consequences.

“The question whether there should be expenses awarded to Daniel Paterson is not quite in the same position. Daniel, as factor for the trust, was probably bound to render accounts to his mother, if his mother required them, or if the manner in which the trust was administered between him and his mother required accounts. But it did not follow that he was bound to preserve vouchers for all these years for every item of expenditure—he and his mother having, as I have said, the whole interest between them, and the mother being satisfied for all these years that all was in order. Daniel's position therefore was a position, I should imagine, common enough in such circumstances, and at all events a position which should have suggested caution on the pursuer's part before assuming that he was entitled, even from Daniel, to an account of charge and discharge with every item formally vouched. At the same time the case must, I suppose, be taken on the footing that Daniel was bound to keep and produce accounts of the income of the trust, and it is quite certain that until the action was raised, Daniel had not, although called upon to do so at the instance of the pursuer, produced to the trustees any account at all. A list of the investments of the estate seems to have been furnished. But directed him to insert the destination in the terms he did. It was essential that he should do so.¹ It was admitted that moveable bonds similar in character to those in question had been allowed to receive testamentary effect, but that was contrary to principle, and they should be dealt with as ordinary deposit-receipts. But in any view the bequest was revoked by the deed of 2d June 1893.² The terms of that deed were unambiguous and absolute, and covered the destinations in the bonds. It was clearly the intention of Mrs Paterson that her estate should be equally divided among her next of kin, and that brought the bonds within the scope of the deed of revocation.³

Argued for the trustees;—The trustees were not concerned with the Clyde Navigation bonds. As regarded expenses, it was said that the conduct of the trustees made the action necessary. But the pursuer did not ask that any of the findings in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered. One of these findings was that the late Mrs Paterson had made no complaints, and another was that in the that was all, and it may be that, all things considered, he (Daniel) was somewhat dilatory in making up such accounts as he ultimately made up, and which accounts I have held sufficient. On the other hand, the action having been brought, there is no doubt that as soon as it was brought there was lodged with Daniel's defences or with the trustees' defences—it does not matter which—an account shewing the income of the trust-estate and its disposal during the period of the liferent, and there was also produced along with that account certain pass-books, &c., which I have held vouch sufficiently all Daniel's payments to his mother in so far as he was bound to vouch them. There may have been one or two further vouchers which were not produced at first, but practically Daniel's answer to the action was production of an account with sufficient vouchers.

"But then it is said that there was not produced along with the account any explanation by him or by the trustees as to the coupons of the trust investment having been from the first entrusted to the old lady, and as to her having cashed these coupons for herself. That is quite true. It was not until objections and answers were ordered that that fact came out. But still that was a fact which the factor might have ascertained on making inquiry, and which I daresay the Messrs Graham would have told him if he had asked them. At all events that explanation was tabled before the second discussion in the Procedure-roll, or before the incurring of any serious expense. And that being so, the only question is what amount of modification I am to make upon the award of expenses against the pursuer. I think, as I have said, that Daniel was a little slack in not at once realising his position, and in not at once tabling his accounts with the necessary explanation; but I hold that at all events before the second discussion in the Procedure-roll, Daniel had made, or the trustees for him had made, all the explanations which were necessary, and had also tabled all the necessary documents; and therefore what I propose to do is to allow Daniel's expenses, subject to modification, which will probably extend to the expenses up to the lodging of the third account—30th November—when all the necessary explanations were before the parties. I shall know when the account comes to be taxed what Daniel's expenses are up to that period. I shall also have in view in fixing the modification the fact that Daniel has to account for a sum of £144 brought out in the final account which he produced.

"As to the pursuer's responsibility, I see no ground for departing from circumstances the pursuer had no claim for an accounting against the trustees. The arrangement came to between Mrs Paterson and her son Daniel was a perfectly natural one. The whole circumstances were well known to the next of kin of Mrs Paterson, and the pursuer must be held to have the same knowledge as those for whom he was acting. So soon as the trustees lodged accounts and vouchers, the action against them should have been dropped.

Argued for the defender Daniel Paterson;—The defender acquiesced in the Lord Ordinary's finding as to expenses, and the reasons stated for it. As regarded the bonds, it was proved that this defender had been authorised by his mother to take them in the terms he had. That being so, the law was firmly established that the destinations must receive effect.¹ The deed of revocation was so expressed as to exclude the bonds, being limited to deeds of settlement and codicils. A general conveyance had never been held to evacuate a special destination of a particular subject.

LORD M'LAREN.—The questions to be considered under this reclaiming note arise out of an accounting instituted by the judicial factor on the estate of the deceased Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson against her husband's testamentary trustees and her son Daniel Paterson, who managed her investments in her lifetime.

The greater part of the argument which we heard was directed to the question of the incidence of the expenses of the action of accounting, which are dealt with in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 9th July 1896. But a question was also argued as to the right to sums amounting to £1950, which is considered under the interlocutor of 30th April 1896, and this question naturally falls to be first considered.

(1) By the third conclusion of the summons it is sought that it should be found and declared that the five bonds there enumerated, bearing to be granted by the Clyde Navigation Trustees in favour of the said Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson and the defender Daniel Paterson (her son), and the survivor of them, were the property of Mrs Paterson, and formed part of her estate at her death, and now belong to the pursuer as judicial factor on her estate, leaving always the defender's claim for an accounting for his share of the said bonds as one of the next of kin.

I understand that the five bonds are expressed in identical terms as regards the destination or obligation to pay. One of them is printed in the appendix to the proof, and under it the obligants bind themselves to pay the rule that a judicial factor—like a trustee in bankruptcy—litigating, does so at his own risk. I do not consider the case here one specially favourable. I think the pursuer, to say the least, was unduly credulous. He accepted without due inquiry the statements of parties whom he ought as a man of the world to have distrusted. At all events he ought to have more fully informed himself of the facts of the case, and ought to have hesitated before making the charges against the defenders which he did make. On the whole, I see no reason for holding the pursuer otherwise than personally liable,—that is to say, unless the funds in his hands are sufficient, as I hope they are, for his relief."

to Mrs Jane Gray or Paterson and Daniel Paterson, and the survivor of them, and their, her, or his executors, administrators, or assignees, the principal sum of £1000.

The defender's statement is that the bonds were investments of the savings of his mother and himself, and that the destination was inserted by the authority of Mrs Paterson and himself, and with the intention that it should receive effect as a destination, and that the right to the sum secured by the bond should pass to the survivor. It will thus be seen that the defender's case involves a question of law and also a question of fact,—that the destination was inserted in the bonds at the desire of Mrs Paterson or with her authority.

If the question of law were open to consideration, there is much to be said in favour of the pursuer's contention, that a destination in a document of debt like a moveable bond ought not to have a testamentary operation. Destinations in the title-deeds of heritable estate stand in a different position. They operate as a devolution of the estate, because according to the common law a grant by the superior containing a destination was the proper mode of regulating the succession to land, and because there could be no reason or motive for the insertion of such a destination at the request of the grantee, except that it was the wish of the grantee that the persons named in the deed should take the estate in succession to himself. But as regards moveable estate, the proper mode of settling the succession is by a will or testamentary trust, and again it cannot be said that the regulation of the succession is the only motive that would account for the insertion of what is called a destination in a moveable bond or document of title, because there is another reason for inserting the name of two persons as payees, viz., the convenience of having a second person who is in a position to give a discharge of the debt or interest in the case of illness or death of the first.

These considerations, I may point out, have received effect in the rule now firmly established that no testamentary effect is to be given to destinations in bank deposit-receipts, and I think it is regrettable that a different rule should have been applied to the construction of moveable obligations. But in the later cases—and I may refer especially to *Walker*¹ and *Connell's Trustees*²—the rule which gives effect to such destinations in bonds was considered to be too firmly established to be disputed, and while it is not to be overlooked that the element of mandate may enter into the design of the creditor in taking the bond payable to himself and another person, this consideration can only have weight to the effect of casting on the second payee or survivor the onus of proving as conditions of the right which he claims, first, that the destination was inserted with the authority of the true creditor or investor; and secondly, that the bond was delivered to the person claiming under it as his proper writ.

In the present case we have the evidence of Mr Daniel Paterson that he made these investments for his mother, and that she gave authority for taking them payable to her and himself and the survivor. The Lord Ordinary states that he believes the evidence of Mr Paterson, and I need hardly say that in a matter depending on credibility this is a very important element. But I must also add that the evidence of a donee is insufficient to prove donation, or what is equivalent to donation, if uncorroborated, and I have therefore considered the proof to see whether it offers the necessary corroboration. Two witnesses speak to Mrs Paterson's knowledge and approval of the terms of these bonds. Mr Graham, the family solicitor, speaking of a bond which was expressed in similar terms to these in question, and which for some reason was transferred to a purchaser, says,—“I am perfectly satisfied that she (Mrs Paterson) knew the terms in which the bond had been taken, and that she was fully aware of the nature of the transaction.” Another witness, Mr Mather, who describes himself as an old friend of Mrs Paterson, says that in the course of conversation on business matters Mrs Paterson told him that she and her son Daniel had money invested jointly in the Clyde Trust. I think this is sufficient corroboration of the defender's evidence, and that we must take it that the destination is the act of Mrs Paterson. On the matter of delivery, I think that the defender had all the possession of the bonds which was possible in the nature of the case, but even if it be supposed that he held them as his mother's agent, this might prevent the destination taking immediate effect, but would not interfere with the testamentary effect of the destination.

Paterson's Judicial Factor v.
Paterson's
Trustees

There remains the question of revocation under Mrs Paterson's will or codicil of 2d June 1893. Now, in the analogous case of heritable destination, upon which this chapter of the law is entirely founded, the case stands thus: If the owner of property holds it in virtue of the deed of another man who has left it to him and his heirs, a deed of revocation and new conveyance in general terms will take effect on the standing destination. But a general revocation or general conveyance will not necessarily or usually affect a previous settlement or destination of a special subject by the same testator, because the destination is like a special legacy, and is presumed to be excepted. This distinction is clearly explained in the Lord Chancellor's opinion in Campbell v. Campbell,¹ and runs through all the decisions. In the absence of anything to shew that Mrs Paterson had the bonds in view in executing the deed of 2d June, I am unable to hold that the deed operated as a revocation of the destination in the bonds. I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of 30th April 1896.

(2) I shall deal more briefly with the question of the expenses of the action. The Lord Ordinary has found the pursuer liable in expenses to the defenders Paterson's trustees, and has found him also liable in expenses to the defender Daniel Paterson subject to modification.

Now, it is to be observed that this is not an action of accounting or distribution in relation to the estate of Mrs Paterson's husband. Under the will of Mr Paterson Mrs Paterson had a general liferent of her husband's estate, and the action only calls for an accounting in relation to Mrs Paterson's estate, which of course includes her liferent. In fact, her estate consists entirely of the savings from her liferent. But if anything is proved in the case, it is proved beyond dispute that the trustees regularly paid over the income of her husband's estate to Mrs Paterson, or, which is the same in legal effect, to her son as her agent with her authority. It may have been quite right to call the trustees as defenders for their interest, but as soon as they produced evidence of the payment of income to Mrs Paterson's nominee, they ought to have been informed that the judicial factor was satisfied, and that there was no need for their further appearance in the case. Their appearance in the case throughout the course of the litigation is the consequence of the pursuer's original act in calling them as defenders, a position from which they have never been freed, and as they have successfully discharged themselves, I am of opinion that they are entitled to their expenses, and that this part of the interlocutor of 9th July is right.

As regards the question between the pursuer and Mr Daniel Paterson, I have felt this to be a question of much difficulty, and I am very unwilling to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in dealing with this question. The pursuer cannot get expenses from Mr Paterson, because he has failed in all the important questions raised in the accounting. But he was placed in a position of some embarrassment from the circumstance that Mr Paterson had not kept regular accounts of his administration of his mother's affairs. This may be explained by the trust which his mother reposed in him, but his own statement that his mother trusted him is hardly an answer to a judicial factor who represents the interests of next of kin. When an account was given in, the judicial factor was not relieved from his obligation to call the defender to account, because many of the items were unvouched, and it appeared that some of the questions raised, and especially this question about the right to the Clyde Navigation bonds, depended on oral evidence. I do not think that the judicial factor was bound to accept the defender's statement that these bonds were taken in the terms which have been considered with Mrs Paterson's authority. The defender ought to have got a mandate from his mother instructing the preparation of the bonds in these terms, and it was the neglect of this proper precaution that necessitated the parole proof. In these circumstances I have come to be of opinion that as between the pursuer and the defender Daniel Paterson there ought to be no finding of expenses to either party.

I observe that the Lord Ordinary has found the pursuer liable to the trustees without the qualifying words "as judicial factor," and according to the views expressed by the majority of the Court of seven Judges in a recent case,¹ this imports a direct liability to Paterson's trustees irrespective of the existence of factory estate. We do not propose to alter this finding, and it will be for the pursuer to find the means of paying these expenses. Whether he has relief against the next of kin on the ground that he was protecting their interests is a question which, as I think, cannot be decided in this process, because the next of kin are not parties to the process, and we cannot make any finding which will prejudice their rights. I move your Lordships accordingly to adhere to the interlocutor of 30th April, and to vary the interlocutor of 9th July 1896 by leaving out the finding of expenses in favour of Daniel Paterson, and in place thereof to find no expenses due to or by the defender Daniel Paterson.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am also of the same opinion. I agree with Lord M'Laren that if the question had been still open it would require serious consideration whether terms of destination in such an instrument as a Clyde Trust bond ought to have the same legal effect as a proper destination in a conveyance of land. I think with his Lordship that that question is now settled by a series of decisions the authority of which is beyond dispute. I therefore agree in the conclusion to which Lord M'Laren has come.

Administration of Justice—Process—Law-Agent—Petition to have Law-Agent's name struck off roll—Proof—Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63).—A society of solicitors petitioned the Court to have the name of S., one of their number, struck off the roll of enrolled law-agents, on the ground that he had been guilty of fraud and embezzlement. It being alleged that S. had left the country, the order for service allowed a period of six weeks for the lodging of answers. The petition was served edictally. No answers were lodged.

Held that, as S. had been neither convicted of the offences charged against him nor fugitated, the petitioners must prove their averments before the prayer of the petition could be granted.

THIS was a petition and complaint under the Law-Agents Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63), at the instance of the Society of Solicitors in Aberdeen and their office-bearers, to have the name of William Sim struck off the roll of enrolled law-agents.

The petitioners averred that from 1884 to 1896 William Sim had practised as a solicitor and law-agent in Aberdeen, "but in or about 9th October 1896, his affairs having become embarrassed, he disappeared, having, it is believed, left the country."

"Since the disappearance of the said William Sim, it has transpired that while practising in Aberdeen he had been guilty of conduct unbecoming a solicitor, and in fact fraudulent. In the course of the years 1893-95 and 1896, when he was in financial difficulties, he borrowed money from clients, on the security of properties belonging to him, on representations that the properties were unencumbered, and that these loans would constitute first charges on the properties, whereas he well knew that the properties were heavily burdened and altogether inadequate as security for the loans. He also received money from clients upon the assurance that he would invest it upon first-class securities, which moneys he made no attempt to invest, but appropriated to his own uses."

Particular instances of the misconduct with which Sim was charged were then set forth.

The petitioners further averred that Sim's estate, which had been sequestrated, was wholly insufficient to meet the claims upon it; that he had fled the country, and that a warrant for his apprehension had been issued at the instance of certain of his creditors.

The Court ordered service upon Sim, and appointed answers to be lodged by him, if so advised, within six weeks.

The petition was thereafter served edictally upon Sim, and a copy of the petition was also posted to his former residence, where his wife still resided. No answers having been lodged within the time appointed, the petitioners moved the Court to grant the prayer of the petition.

At advising,—

The LORD PRESIDENT delivered the following opinion as the judgment of the Court :—This is an application to have the name of William Sim struck off the roll of enrolled law-agents, on the ground that he has been guilty of fraud and embezzlement. The petitioners' motion is that the prayer be granted.

The Court consider the application premature. The accused person has neither been convicted nor fugitated. Unless the petitioners are prepared to prove their averments, it is for their consideration whether they should not in the meantime withdraw their petition.

ON the motion of the petitioners, the Court thereafter allowed them a proof of their averments.

County Council of County
of Elgin.

The Local Government Board for Scotland presented a petition under section 97 of the Public Health Act, 1867, against the County Council of Elgin, as the Local Authority for the county, praying the Court to remit to a man of skill to inquire into the water supply of Hopeman district (which had been formed into a special water supply district under the Act), and thereafter to find that the Local Authority had refused or neglected to do what was required of them under the Act, by refusing or delaying to introduce into the district a supply of water sufficient and suitable for the domestic use of the inhabitants, and that their refusal or delay was an obstruction in the execution of the Act; and further, to ordain the respondents to execute the work necessary to provide such a supply. The petitioners averred that the present supply of water for Hopeman was inadequate and dangerous to public health; that the respondents had delayed for a long period to deal with the matter, and had no present intention of doing so, and that this failure was a refusal or neglect to do what was required of them, and an obstruction in the execution of the Act.

The petitioners did not set forth any scheme by which the respondents might have provided a water supply, but they founded on section 89 of the Public Health Act, 1867, as authorising them to borrow any sum required for the purpose on the security of the special water assessments, and of the general assessments.

The respondents lodged answers, in which they stated that they had obtained the report of an engineer as to the cost of introducing a supply of water by gravitation, but it shewed that the cost would greatly exceed any sum which could be raised within the special water district by the maximum assessment of 2s. 6d., and that knowing this they were not entitled to borrow a larger sum for the benefit of the special water district on the security of the general assessments payable by the whole county. They further stated that they were taking steps to improve the existing sources of supply.

The petitioners moved for a remit before answer.

The Court refused the petition, on the ground that it did not set forth any scheme for providing an improved supply of water which the respondents could have adopted within the 2s. 6d. limit, and that the petition was to be regarded as brought for the purpose of compelling the Local Authority to bring a supply of water by gravitation for the benefit of the special district at the cost of the whole county.

The petitioners did not set forth any scheme by which the respondents might have provided a water supply, but they founded on section 89 of the Public Health Act, 1867,* as authorising them to

* The Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), section 89, enacted,—“With respect to the improvement of burghs having a population of less than ten thousand according to the census last taken, and not having a local Act for police purposes, and with respect to parishes (exclusive of any parts of such parishes as are situated within the district of any Local Authority other than the Parochial Boards of such parishes): (1) the Local Authority, if they think it expedient so to do, may acquire and provide or arrange for a supply of water for the domestic use of the inhabitants, and for that purpose may conduct water from any lake, &c., and do and execute all such works, matters, and things as shall be necessary and proper for the aforesaid purpose, . . . and for the purposes aforesaid the Local Authority shall be held to have all the powers and rights given to promoters of undertakings by the Lands Clauses Acts; . . . Answers were lodged by the County Council of Elgin in which they averred "that the net assessable rental of the area included in the special water supply district is only £1200, so that an assessment of 2s. 6d. per £, which is the maximum assessment in a special water supply and drainage district for all purposes under the Public Health Amendment Act, 1871, sec. 1, would only yield £150 per annum. The assessment at present payable for all purposes under the Public Health Act amounts to 6d. per £. The balance for which the inhabitants could be assessed for any new water scheme amounts to only £120, which would be capable of meeting the annual instalment of principal and interest of the sum of £2215 only. This is the only available assessment from which to meet expenses for sewerage, drainage, the erection of permanent hospitals, and the like, as well as the cost of providing a supply of water and keeping it in an efficient state of repair."

County Council of Elgin.

They further averred that they had obtained a report from an engineer as to the cost of obtaining a supply of water by gravitation from outside districts. He reported on certain schemes, but the estimated cost was £4719, 5s.

"The respondents having thus found it impracticable to procure an increased supply of water for Hopeman from outside districts by gravitation, turned their attention to the existing sources of water supply, with the view of seeing whether these could not be made available."

"In addition to the company well, Messrs Milne and Hogg have instructions to bore and sink another well or wells, and to make further investigations for affording a local supply to the village. The proprietor and tenants of ground suitable for the purpose have given permission to enter on it and prospect for a suitable site or sites, and operations are at the present moment being conducted with the view of ascertaining same. It is confidently anticipated that a large additional supply of water can in this manner be obtained."

"The respondents accordingly submit that no further step should be taken in the petition until the scheme which they have adopted for bringing a supply of water to the special district in question has been completed and tested. They maintain that they are entitled to provide such a supply by digging wells, or by availing themselves of existing sources of supply, and that they are not bound, at an expenditure which is entirely out of proportion to the means of the district or the objects to be attained, to introduce a gravitation supply. They understand that a section of the inhabitants, at whose instigation the present proceedings have been taken, desire to have a gravitation supply, the cost of which would have to be mainly borne by the county, and which will require to be immediately followed by extensive drainage and sewage works, the whole cost of which (the maximum assessment being already exhausted by the cost of the water supply) would necessarily be thrown entirely upon the county. The respondents submit that they are the judges of how a supply of water for the domestic use of the inhabitants of Hopeman should be obtained, and they have resolved that it should be from wells, as being the only practicable mode in the circumstances already narrated. Owing to a section of the inhabitants desiring a scheme of a different nature, they have not assisted the respondents in providing a supply of water by the means in question, but on the contrary have ob-

The petitioners averred that the present supply of water for Hopeman was inadequate and dangerous to public health; that the respondents had delayed for a long period to deal with the matter, and had no present intention of doing so, and that this failure was a refusal or neglect to do what was required of them, and an obstruction in the execution of the Act. structed them in every possible way. If the respondents are bound to provide a supply of water by gravitation, whatever the expense, other villages will no doubt seek to obtain the same advantages at the cost of the ratepayers in the county, who derive no benefit from the expenditure upon such works. . . .

"In the whole circumstances the respondents maintain that the petition should be refused, with expenses, in respect (1) that it is not competent under section 97 of the statute; (2) that there are no relevant averments of the respondents having refused or neglected to do any duty imposed upon them by law or by the Public Health Act, 1867; (3) that the scheme which the respondents are in course of carrying out will give a supply of water sufficient and suitable for the domestic uses of the inhabitants of Hopeman, and for the sanitary and other purposes thereof. In any event the respondents maintain that the proceedings should be sisted for six months until the scheme which they are in course of carrying out has been completed and tested."

Argued for the petitioners;—The petition was competent.¹ Under the Act of 1867, the Local Authority were empowered to provide a proper water supply, and having such a power for the public benefit, they were bound to exercise it.² The answers of the respondents were unsatisfactory. It was no answer to plead that they had reached the maximum assessment for all purposes under the Public Health Act, for it had been decided³ that where a Local Authority had exhausted the resources of the special water supply district, it might borrow money upon the security of the whole authority, and assess the rest of the district for payment of the loan and interest. The real question was, whether they had done their duty, or had refused, or were delaying to do it. A remit fell to be made to a reporter to report upon the existing state of matters, with a view to the Local Authority being compelled to take action.

Argued for the respondents;—The petition was incompetent. The Local Authority were under the statute the judges of the expediency of introducing a water supply, and in rejecting the gravitation scheme they were acting after due consideration and within their powers. The petition and complaint would only have been competent if the respondents had absolutely declined to consider the matter in question. While they had rejected the gravitation scheme, they were formulating one which would turn the present sources to the best account. *Tolmie*³ was no authority for the proposition that a Local Authority could, when they had exhausted their special assessing powers, fall back upon the general assessment. In none of the petitioner's cases was there a Local Authority actually in course (as here) of carrying out a system for giving good water to a district. The Court would grant time in order to see what the effect of the Local Authority's operations would be.

No. 93.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The jurisdiction conferred on the Court of Session by the 97th section of the Public Health Act, like the corresponding jurisdiction conferred in identical terms by the Poor-Law Act, has been found, I believe, to operate beneficially in furthering the execution of statutory duties. On each occasion, however, on which it is invoked we must be satisfied that the Local Authority convened has refused or neglected to do what is by law required of them, or that an obstruction has arisen in the execution of the Act.

Feb. 5, 1897.
Local Government Board for Scotland v.
County Council of County
of Elgin.

In the present case the failure of the Local Authority to introduce a proper supply of water is what is alleged to constitute a refusal or neglect and an obstruction.

When the case is sifted, the true question is this,—Is the refusal of the Local Authority to provide a water supply by gravitation for the Hopeman special district a refusal to do their duty under the Act? and is the Court to compel them to provide a water supply by gravitation?

Now, I do not dwell on the fact that the duty of the Local Authority under the statute is, “if they think it expedient,” to provide a water supply for the inhabitants (and this is the governing direction applicable to special districts as well as undivided areas). The primary duty of the Local Authority is to consider the question, but I make no doubt that any recalcitrancy or perversity in deciding it might be dealt with under this section.

The position of this Local Authority, however, is a definite one. “Under the statutes which we administer,” say they, “we have an assessing power limited to 2s. 6d. per £1; we have considered and calculated the cost of bringing water by gravitation to this district, and no scheme can be devised the cost of which will not greatly exceed our assessing powers.” They go on to say that this more ambitious plan being beyond their powers, they are busy improving the existing supply which is got from certain wells, and they feel pretty sure that when their improvements have been made the supply, if not affluent, will be adequate for the somewhat homely requirements of the district. Their primary answer, however, to the demand of the Local Government Board that they shall provide water by gravitation is non possumus.

Now, the possible answers of the Local Government Board to this position would seem to be two. They might say—“Your calculations of the cost of a gravitation supply as compared with the yield of a 2s. 6d. rate over your assessable area are wrong; you overrate the one or you underrate the other.” They might have thought out some gravitation scheme and tabled it in detail, which is within the financial ability of the Local Authority, and they might have challenged the Local Authority to carry out this scheme or be held as contumacious. They have no such case at all.

Or they might say, “You are wrong in your law as to your financial ability; your assessing power is not circumscribed by the 2s. 6d. limit.” This they have said, and as this is a question about the administration of a statute directly within their province, and as the present application has no other ground to rest on, I listened and read, in the confident expectation that

No. 93. there was something to overcome what seemed the clear limitation to 2s. 6d. imposed by the statutes. In this, however, I have been disappointed. The learned counsel for the Local Government Board, so long as they had only the statutes before them, did not offer any analysis or construction which would evade or alter the apparently clear terms of the statutes; and they relied solely on the case of Tolmie.¹ Now, I am willing, because I am bound, to treat *Tolmie's*¹ case as having been well decided. But the theory of *Tolmie's*¹ case is that if money has been borrowed for the construction of a water supply for a district, and if, owing to miscalculation, the actual cost exceeds the 2s. 6d. limit, then a ratepayer outside the district cannot refuse payment of an assessment levied to relieve the Local Authority of a loan, which had been made for the purposes of the district supply, but not the less was a debt of the Local Authority. The difference between that case and the present is so clear that one is not more than tempted to appreciate the difficulty of Lord Rutherford Clark or the dissent of Lord Lee. *Tolmie's*¹ case does not throw the smallest doubt on this—that whatever means of extrication may be open for those who outrun it, the legitimate administration of the Local Authority of a special district is bounded by the 2s. 6d. limit; and any Local Authority which announced its intention of undertaking a scheme which avowedly transcended that limit would be liable to interdict at the instance of a ratepayer.

cil of County

Yet the present complaint against the Local Authority is simply that they decline to take this adventurous course. I say so, because as already pointed out, the petitioners do not table any gravitation scheme as possible of execution within the 2s. 6d. limit.

Nothing that I have said implies any optimist views of the scheme in which the Local Authority are engaged, and the immense delay which has taken place in getting any amendment of a very defective condition of things makes it natural that some pressure should be thought wholesome.

But, on the question whether by refusing to introduce a supply of water by gravitation the Local Authority have refused to do what is required by law, I cannot withhold my judgment in their favour; and no other question is before us. I am therefore for refusing the petition. It is unnecessary to say that a decree to this effect would confer no indemnity for any delay for the future in improving the water supply according to the measure of the Local Authority's powers, or debar the Local Government Board from resorting to this Court should the occasion arise. It is fair to say that I add this for greater clearness, and for no other reason.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the petition.

Whitson v.
Blairgowrie
District
Committee.

Road—Authority to take materials from enclosed land—Specification of time and place—Blasting—General Turnpike Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43), sec. 80.—A district committee of a county council served a notice upon a proprietor intimating that they intended, in the exercise of their statutory powers, to take road material from an enclosed field upon his estate, at a spot which “will on application by you to . . . the road surveyor of the said district, be . . . specifically pointed out on a map of the locality or on the ground.”

In the course of the proceedings before the Sheriff which followed upon the notice, it appeared that the intention of the committee was to carry an existing quarry on unenclosed ground westwards into the proprietor's enclosed land, and the spot where the enclosed land would be entered upon was pointed out on a map of the locality.

The Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding that the committee were “entitled to proceed with their proposed operations, but under the restriction and condition” that, if the operations were carried more than fifty yards into the enclosed land they should provide a service bridge to give the proprietor access from one side of the workings to the other, and that no blasting should take place when agricultural work was being carried on within 100 yards of the spot where the blast was to be made:

The extract decree bore, inter alia, that the Sheriff found that the committee were entitled to search for, dig, and carry away road material from the proprietor's enclosed land at a spot which would be pointed out by the road surveyor on application by the proprietor.

In an action by the proprietor for reduction of the notice, interlocutor, and extract, held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) (1) that the spot at which the material was to be taken was sufficiently identified as that which had been pointed out in the proceedings before the Sheriff; (2) that it was not necessary that any time limit should be imposed on the proposed operations, either in the notice or the decree; (3) that blasting, as a usual and necessary method of quarrying, was authorised by the statute; and (4) that the insertion by the Sheriff of the condition as to the erection of a service bridge was not a good ground for reducing the decree.

Opinion by the Lord President that the insertion of the condition as to the erection of the service bridge was within the discretion conferred upon the Sheriff by section 80 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831.

Opinion by Lord Adam that although the condition requiring the erection of the service bridge might be beyond the Sheriff's power, in respect that it would be necessary to take land belonging to the pursuer for the support of the bridge, the only result would be that if the quarry reached the point specified, the Committee would have either to stop working or make a fresh application to the Sheriff.

FOR a number of years prior to 1895 the Eastern District of the 1st Division. County Council of Perthshire, and their predecessors, the Cally District Road Trustees, had been in use to obtain road metal from a quarry known as Catscraig Quarry, situated within a piece of rough unenclosed ground on the estate of Parkhill, belonging to Charles Hill Whitson. In the beginning of 1895 the District Committee had worked the whinstone in the quarry to the limit of the unenclosed land, and to the margin of an enclosed field on the farm of Westfields of Rattray, part of the estate of Parkhill. On 28th February 1895, the District Committee served the following notice on Mr Whitson :—"Take notice that the Blairgowrie or Eastern District Committee of the County Council of the County of Perth, appointed under the 'Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' and as road trustees acting under and in virtue of the 'Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,' adopted in the said county, in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the said Acts and statutory provisions therewith incorporated,* but always upon the terms and conditions thereby provided for, intend by themselves or such persons as may be authorised by the said Committee to search for, dig, and carry away materials for making or repairing highways (as 'highway' is defined by section 3 of said Act of 1878) within the said district, and the footpaths thereof, and for building, making, or repairing bridges or other works within the said district connected with such highways, from enclosed land whereof you are the proprietor, and of which David Fernie, farmer, Westfields, Rattray, is the present occupier, situated within the said district, in the parish of Rattray, and on the estate of Parkhill, and at a spot on such land within an arable field on the farm of Westfields, situated on the west side of the den or ravine known as Catsraig Quarry, which spot so to be entered upon will on application by you to Robert Grant, residing at Bengarth, Rattray, the road surveyor for the said district, be also specifically pointed out on a map of the locality or on the ground: and you are hereby required to appear before the Sheriff of the said county or his Substitute, within the ordinary Sheriff Court House at Perth, upon Friday the 15th day of March 1895 years, at twelve o'clock noon, being the time and place appointed by the said Sheriff or his Substitute for such appearance, to shew cause, if any such there be, why such materials should not be so taken."

Sundry procedure, including a proof, followed upon this notice before the Sheriff-substitute of Perthshire (Grahame). In the course of these proceedings it was explained that the intention of the committee was to carry the existing quarry westward into the enclosed field mentioned in the notice, and the spot where the enclosed land would be entered on was indicated on a map of the locality. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the

Blairgowrie
District
Committee.

The extract of the Sheriff-substitute's decree bore, inter alia, that the District Committee were entitled, in the exercise of their statutory powers, to search for, dig, and carry away materials for making or repairing highways or bridges within their district, "from enclosed land whereof the said Charles Hill Whitson is the proprietor, and of which the said David Fernie is the present occupier, situated within the said district, in the parish of Rattray, and on the estate of Parkhill, and at a spot on such land within an arable field on the farm of Westfields, situated on the west side of the den or ravine known as Catsraig Quarry, which spot so to be entered upon will, on application by the said Charles Hill Whitson or the said David Fernie to Robert Grant, residing at Bengarth, Rattray, the road surveyor for the said district, be also specifically pointed out on a map of the locality or on the ground." The conditions as to the building of the service bridge and blasting followed.

In December 1895 Mr Whitson brought an action for reduction of the notice served upon him by the District Committee, the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and the extract decree.

The pursuer averred, —(Cond. 7) "The said statutory notice, decree, and extract are invalid, and not authorised by the statutes in terms of which they bear to proceed, and they are further void from uncertainty and ambiguity. Neither the said notice nor the said decree and extract identify the spot or place from which the materials are to be removed, or specify any limit to the proposed operations either in respect of the quantity of material to be removed or in respect of the length or distance to which the operations are to be carried along the line of said whinstone vein or otherwise. The defenders have no right to apply for, and the Sheriff has no authority to grant, a licence to remove materials without specifying both the locality and extent of the operations necessary for that purpose. Moreover, such licence should be limited to the necessities of the particular occasion in respect of which the application is made. In the circumstances above condescended upon, the licence as granted by the Sheriff is not only illegal and unwarranted but grossly injurious and oppressive to the pursuer. The said extract is further incompetent in respect it is disconform in material particulars to the Sheriff's interlocutor."

He pleaded that the notice, the interlocutor, and the extract were unauthorised by statute, and that they were wanting in the specification of essential particulars, and further that the extract was disconform to and unwarranted by the interlocutor.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

* “OPINION.—I do not think I need make avizandum with this case. It appears to me that the pursuer's objections to these proceedings are hypercritical. The extract decree is, as far as I can see, quite in terms of the Sheriff's interlocutor; and the Sheriff's interlocutor—putting out of view in the meantime certain conditions which he adjects, and which are not in controversy—seems to me to be just in terms of the defenders' notice. The question therefore is as to the validity of the defenders' notice. Is it or is it not a notice within the statutes, and particularly section 80 of the Statute 1 and 2 Will. IV. ?

“Now, it is said that the notice is bad in respect that it does not define the area within which the powers in question are to be exercised. In my opinion it does sufficiently define that area. It defines it, in the first place, as being within the estate of Parkhill. That may or may not be enough. Probably it would not be enough. But it further defines it as being within the farm of Westfields, of which David Fernie is the tenant. I do not know whether or not that would be enough. I incline to think it would perhaps be enough. But the notice goes further, and defines the area as an area to be pointed out within a certain arable field—an arable field which, according to the plan, consists of about 8 acres, and of which the situation is well defined. I am not prepared to say that a notice to take materials within a certain field consisting of about 8 acres is a bad notice—a bad notice under the statute. The statute does not define the maximum magnitude of the area to be specified in the notice. The question whether the area within which the powers are proposed to be exercised is or is not too wide, is a question which the statute leaves to the Sheriff, and on which I take it the Sheriff is final; and therefore as regards this objection, my opinion, in the first place, is, that the area here does seem to be sufficiently specified, and does not prima facie seem to be too wide. But even if it were thought to be too wide, that is not in my view a ground for reducing the Sheriff's judgment, because that matter is—as I read the statute—a matter for the Sheriff, and the Sheriff has either dealt with it, or, what comes to the same thing, was not asked by the pursuer to deal with it.

“But then it is said that the notice, interlocutor, and decree are bad because they do not define the time for which the power is to be exercised. Now, it is quite true that they do not. The power which has been granted—or rather the power with respect to which the notice was given, and which the Sheriff has granted—is a power to take materials from this enclosed land for an indefinite time—a time only limited by the necessities of the roads in this neighbourhood, and which necessities will probably be continuous. But I do not find that the Scotch statute (I say nothing of the English statute mentioned in argument) requires that the notice shall specify a time limit. I think it, on the contrary, leaves it for the Road Trustees to give notice either for a certain time or for an indefinite time, and leaves it to the Sheriff to define the time, if the time in the notice is indefinite and the landlord is able to satisfy the Sheriff that a definition should be made. In this case the time being indefinite, I have no doubt that the Sheriff, if asked, would have considered the question whether a time limit should be fixed, as he might quite possibly have come to the conclusion that such should be fixed; but nothing of that kind appears to have been suggested. But, as I said before, either the Sheriff was asked to fix a limit and declined, or the matter was not brought before him as a matter on which the pursuer desired his intervention.

required the Sheriff's authority to dig and carry them away from enclosed land. When they made application to the Sheriff they were bound to state definitely whence the stones were to be taken, and the Sheriff was bound in giving authority to define the limits of its exercise in place and time. It was an unreasonable construction of the Act to hold that unlimited authority might be given to quarry the whole of a seam of stone, if required. Under the corresponding English statute, it was held that the authority given must be reasonably defined.¹ (2) The right to dig and carry away did not include the right to blast. That was not a usual method of obtaining road metal at the date of the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43, the practice then being to gather surface stones. The burden on the proprietor could not be increased without statutory authority.² (3) The Sheriff had no power to impose the condition as to the building of a service bridge, which would involve the taking of more land from the pursuer. (4) The interlocutor was not a sufficient warrant for the extract.

Whitson v.
Blairgowrie
District
Committee.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The interlocutor and decree were not wanting in definition. The intention of the defenders was to continue the quarry from a definite point, viz., the point it had already reached, and this they were entitled to do. They made no claim of any right to stop the existing workings and go to a different part of the pursuer's field. The English Act was in different terms from the Scotch. The latter contained no provision requiring a limitation as to time to be imposed when authority was granted under it. The English cases, therefore, did not apply. The point might have been raised in Scotland, but had not been raised.³ (2) "To dig" meant to quarry according to the usual methods, of which blasting was one, and a necessary one. (3) The condition as to the erection of the bridge was in the pursuer's favour, and he could not use it to found an objection to the validity of the authority given to the defenders. Even if the pursuer had a right to take the objection, the insertion of this condition could not be held to vitiate the decree. The statute gave a discretion to the Sheriff, and the insertion of such a condition was a reasonable exercise of the discretion given him. Further, the defenders would not make the bridge if the pursuer objected. At all events the question did not arise until the quarry had been carried fifty yards into the field. (4) The extract was in conformity with the interlocutor, but if not, a new extract could be got.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have no jurisdiction to review on its merits any order made by the Sheriff; and the only question before us is, whether the Sheriff has exceeded his statutory powers in making the order libelled.

Now, it cannot be disputed that the District Committee is entitled to take stones for the roads from a quarry, or from enclosed land (with the exception of orchards and other places specified), and to go on taking them so long as the roads require the stones. In the case of enclosed land, from which stone has not been previously taken, notice must be given to the proprietor, and the Sheriff must either authorise or prohibit the taking the material, the Sheriff having power to make such order as he thinks fit. This last provision shews that it is competent to the Sheriff to give a conditional or qualified permission.

When we turn to the proceedings in this case, the notice, at first sight, certainly reads as if the District Committee were asking very wide powers; and I am not surprised if it caused some alarm. But, when the notice is examined, it appears that the authority craved was to take stones by quarrying into the field named, at a particular spot. The notice, at first sight, reads as if the Committee wished to have a roving power over this field of eight acres; but this perhaps arose from a mistake on the part of the Committee as to what they required to notify. They have given notice of their intention to search for, as well as to carry away, and the Sheriff's order echoes the notice on this point. But as I read the section, no notice is required to entitle the Committee to search for stone in the lands; all they require to give notice of is their intention to take materials from the lands. Well then, in the proceedings before the Sheriff, Mr Grant, the surveyor, according to the promise in the notice, pointed out the place of the proposed taking of materials; and in substance what is proposed is simply to carry a quarry from which materials have hitherto been got for the roads, further westwards into the field in question. I may remark in passing, that the Sheriff's order, rather mechanically adopting the words of the notice, speaks of the place of operations as one which will (in the future) be pointed out by Mr Grant. I do not read this as meaning that the authority will apply to any spot or spots which Mr Grant may from time to time point out, but as applying to the place already pointed out by Mr Grant. It would have been better had it been otherwise expressed, but the words of the order may be justified if they are read as meaning, that if anyone likes, Mr Grant will point out the place again.

Well now, if this operation, which the Sheriff has authorised, had been likely to be accomplished by a few cartfuls of stone being taken away, I really do not see what objection could be taken to it. And the next thing to observe is, that the Act imposes no limit, except the requirements of the roads, on the amount which may be taken. It would appear that, in this case, it is contemplated that the Committee will go on taking materials for an indefinite time, and the Sheriff has made some conditions as to access when the operations have gone on a certain distance. I can only say that I do not think that these conditions (which are in the interest of the landlord, if the workings are lawful, and need not be enforced unless he desires them), are either in themselves illegal or denote a contemplation of endurance which makes the order illegal.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in what he says of the absence from the order of the specification of a limit of time. A further objection was taken that blasting is not a lawful operation under section 80, and that the order is bad because it conditionally authorises blasting. I think this objection untenable. The Committee have right under the section to remove materials for making and repairing roads and also for building. In my opinion they are entitled to do what is usual and necessary to effectuate that power, and blasting is an operation usual and necessary for these purposes. No. 94.

The result is that I agree in the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary. It may be well to say, however, that I am not to be held as concurring in the observations made obiter by the Lord Ordinary as to what would or would not in other cases be sufficient specification of the place from which it is proposed to take materials. The burden which this section imposes on landlords is a heavy one, and is not to be augmented by a latitude which might embarrass the use of property. The Sheriffs have, as I read the statute, no power to dedicate for all time the whole of a large enclosed field to the operations of the District Committee. Shorter views are to be taken. In the present instance, there is nothing to prevent the pursuer from using the field in any way he thinks fit, and if any use so made should in the future bring the ground within the protected subjects specified in this section, then I see nothing in this order which will entitle the District Committee of the day to encroach on such ground. I am for adhering.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the condition imposed by the Sheriff upon the Committee, that, in case of their operations being carried into the field beyond a distance of fifty yards, they should build a service bridge, it may be that he had no power to insert any such condition, since the pursuer's land would be required for building such a bridge. But the only result of that is that, if the quarry does reach that point, the Committee may have either to stop working, or to go back to the Sheriff. There are accordingly, in my opinion, no grounds for interfering with the Sheriff's order.

Succession—Will—Revocation—Conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit.
—A, sixteen months after his marriage, executed a will, by which he left his whole estate to his wife. Five years later a child was born of the marriage, and fourteen months afterwards A died. Held that the conditio si testator sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the will became inoperative on the birth of the child.

Elder's Trustees v. Elder, 21 R. 704, and 22 R. 505, and Dobie's Trustees v. Pritchard, 15 R. 2, commented on.

1st Division.

PETER LAWRIE M'KIE was married to Miss Anne Kennedy in September 1888. There was no contract of marriage between them. There was one child of the marriage—Angela M'Kie—who was born upon 24th April 1895.

Mr M'Kie died on 8th July 1896, survived by his widow and child, and leaving a disposition and settlement deposited with his agents, dated 5th February 1890.

By his settlement Mr M'Kie bequeathed his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to his wife, whom he also appointed his sole executrix.

The nett value of his estate was £14,046 or thereby. Of this sum £3000 was contained in a bond and disposition in security, so that the legitim fund was about £3680, and the jus relictæ a similar amount.

Mr William Crawford, Duns, was appointed factor loco tutoris to Miss Angela M'Kie on the petition of her mother as her guardian.

A doubt having arisen as to the share of her father's estate to which Angela M'Kie was entitled, a special case was presented by Mr Crawford, as factor loco tutoris, of the first part, and Mrs M'Kie, of the second part, which narrated the foregoing facts.

* The A. S. July 15, 1876, General Regulation 5, provides,—“Notwithstanding that a party shall be found entitled to expenses generally, yet if, on the taxation of the account, it shall appear that there is any particular part or branch of the litigation in which such party has proved unsuccessful, or that any part of the expense has been occasioned through his own fault, he shall not be allowed the expense of such parts or branches of the proceedings.”

The first party maintained that the fact of the birth of a child subsequent to the execution of the disposition and settlement by Mr M'Kie revoked it or rendered it invalid; that therefore Mr M'Kie died intestate, and that Angela M'Kie was entitled to the sum in the bond for £3000—subject to the second party's right of terce or one-third part of the interest of the bond—and to one-third of the remainder of his estate as legitim, and one-third as dead's part. No. 96.
Feb. 16, 1897.
M'Kie's Tutor
v. M'Kie.

The second party, on the other hand, maintained that the birth of the child about fifteen months prior to the testator's death did not revoke or invalidate the deed, that Mr M'Kie did not die intestate, and that the second party was in virtue of the deed entitled to the whole estate of her deceased husband, subject only to the child's claim for legitim.

The following question, inter alia, was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"Did the birth of the child subsequent to the execution of the said settlement by the said Peter Lawrie M'Kie have the effect of revoking the said settlement or rendering it invalid?"

Argued for the first party;—There were no circumstances here to counterbalance the presumption that the birth of a child revoked a will.¹ The lapse of fourteen months between the birth of the child and the testator's death did not do so, for mere lapse of time had always been held to be insufficient.² Indeed, unless the testator had made it "as plain as a pikestaff"³ that he did not intend the succession to go to the child, the condition would apply.

Argued for the second party;—The presumption was of varying force, and might be rebutted by circumstances. Here the circumstances were sufficient to displace it,—the will was executed only sixteen months after marriage; the child would receive a sufficient provision as legitim; the testator survived his child's birth for more than fourteen months without doing anything to revoke the will; and the will was conceived in favour not of a stranger, but of the testator's widow. Lapse of time, especially if coupled with other circumstances, was sufficient.⁴ Lord Rutherford Clark in *Dobie*² went further than any other Judge or writer. The presumption rested on a rule of equity that a will made under circumstances which were very different from the actual circumstances at death ought not to be treated as the testator's last will.⁵ Everything in this case, however, pointed to the intention of the testator being that his will should stand.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether Mr M'Kie's settlement, by which he left the whole of his estate to his wife, was revoked by the birth of a child occurring after its date.

Now, having regard to the doctrines laid down in the case of Elder's Trustees,⁵ I think there is a principle that when a child is born the presumption of law is that its birth renders a previous settlement invalid—a presumption which can only be rebutted by proof of facts and circumstances shewing that the intention of the testator was that the will should stand. I think that this is not a very satisfactory position from the point of view of a Judge. I could understand that a good principle to adopt would be that of Roman law, viz., that the birth of a child revokes unconditionally a previous settlement. That would seem to have been the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark as given in the case of Dobie's Trustees,¹ but it has not been adopted in the more recent views of the law, and the question accordingly depends on the consideration of facts and circumstances. Now, to draw inferences from facts and circumstances is always a very difficult function to perform. It is like making a new will for a man. The only circumstances referred to here are, in the first place, the lapse of fourteen months between the birth of the child and the death of the father, which does not appear to me to be of sufficient importance to rebut the general presumption; and, secondly, the fact that the will was in favour of the mother and not of a stranger, which is certainly of importance, but which is also, in my opinion, not strong enough to rebut the presumption.

Accordingly, in my opinion, we should answer the question in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—It may be that in the opinion of some lawyers the rule with which we are here concerned is not founded on the best consideration of equity, or really represents the most probable intention of the testator. But the rule has been recognised in our practice for a long time, and we must apply it with the aid of the known expositions of the law. One thing is manifest, that the presumed revocation of a will by the subsequent birth of a child is not an absolute presumption. There may be exceptions to it. I am sorry to say that it is very difficult to find from the authorised expositions of the law what these exceptions are.

The case of *Elder*² is important in this connection, as it settled this point, that the Court will not allow proof of declaration of the deceased as either setting up the will or as fortifying the presumption against the subsistence of the will. For in that case the Lord Ordinary had allowed a proof, but the interlocutor was recalled by the Inner-House, and judgment was given upon the known and undisputed facts appearing on the record.

I should hesitate to say that the presumed revocation was a mere question of circumstances. It seems to me impossible to find a solution of the practical questions with which the Courts have to deal under such an indefinite standard. It rather appears to me that the presumption can only be displaced by something that amounts to a tangible and clear expression of the testator's wish that his will should subsist, e.g., by his executing a codicil to it, or by his taking measures of precaution shewing that he treated his will as a subsisting document. Certainly there is no authority for holding that mere lapse of time is sufficient to overcome the presumption. In the light of principle it is very difficult to see why it should—why, in other words, a document which is dead should be revived by the elapse of time. The effect of lapse of time is to strengthen the counter presumption which may arise from some indication of the testator's wish, which by itself might be insufficient,—for example, if the testator had taken great care to preserve his will, or had made some written reference to it after the lapse of years from the birth of a child. I have been led to consider what kind of evidence is sufficient to overcome the presumption of revocation, because we cannot answer the question raised in the present case without considering the kind of evidence which is admissible to rebut the presumption. There is really nothing in this case which is adverse to the presumption except the survivance of the testator for a relatively short period without making a new will. I agree with Lord Adam that this circumstance is not sufficient of itself.

I have come to this conclusion not without regret, for I cannot help thinking that when the testator made his will his real view was that it should stand until his child, if he should have a child, should reach the years of discretion. I do not think a man in the position of the testator, leaving a wife and a young child surviving him, could make a more reasonable will than was here made, and I cannot help regretting that the presumption must be applied, for I think we are denying effect to a will which really represents the testator's intention.

A. S. 16th February 1841.

PETER COCKBURN AND OTHERS brought an action for reduction of 2ND DIVISION. the settlement of their mother, Elizabeth Rutherford or Cockburn, widow of the late Peter Cockburn, dairymen, Leith, against Peter Hogg and Others, the trustees named in the settlement. The action was tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury on 6th February 1897. The jury at 6.30 P.M. on that day returned a verdict finding that the settlement was not the deed of the deceased. The Court adjourned on 6th February for the February week, and did not sit again until Tuesday, February 16th. On February 17th the defenders gave notice of a motion for a rule to shew cause. At the calling in the Single Bills next day the pursuers objected that under the A. S., 16th February 1841, sec. 36, the notice of motion was too late, as it had not been given within ten days of the trial. Ship—Charter-party—Cargo of fruit—Exception of shipowners' liability for "inherent deterioration"—Agent and Principal—Deviation from charter-party by charterers' agent—Ultra vires.—By charter-party a steamship was chartered to proceed to Seville and there load from the charterers or their agents 1500 half chests of oranges, and being so loaded to proceed to Leith direct, and deliver the same agreeably to bills of lading, "the steamer to have liberty before loading fruit to load lead or mineral, also cork-wood, for owners' benefit, the same to be discharged after fruit." A marginal note on the charter-party bore that the captain was to apply to F. G. for cargo.

The bills of lading for the fruit bore that it had been shipped "in good order and well conditioned," and took the shipowners bound to deliver it in the like good order and condition, subject to specified exceptions, including "not responsible for . . . inherent deterioration."

By agreement between F. G. and the master of the steamer, the fruit was loaded before, and was also to some extent discharged after, the mineral and the cork-wood, with the result that the fruit was about six days longer in the hold than it would have been had the vessel been loaded in terms of the charter-party.

The fruit having been delivered at Leith in a deteriorated condition, the charterer brought an action for damages against the shipowners, pleading

* The A. S. 16th February 1841, sec. 36, enacts,—“When the party against whom the verdict has been found intends, without lodging a bill of exceptions, to apply for a new trial in causes which have been tried at the sittings after the end of the session, or during the Christmas recess, or at the Circuits, such party shall give notice of a motion for a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted, within six days after the commencement of a new session, or the meeting of the Court after the Christmas recess, or ten days after the trial of the cause if the cause has been tried during the session or immediately before the sitting down of the session.”

The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 4, enacts,—“ . . . it shall be lawful for the Court at the time of the Christmas recess to adjourn for a period not exceeding fourteen days, and to adjourn at such time during the month of February as shall be most convenient for a period not exceeding seven days. . . .”

that the damage had been caused by the undue detention of the fruit in the hold of the ship consequent on the deviation from the charter-party. No. 98.

The defenders maintained that they were not liable, in respect that the damage had arisen from the "inherent deterioration" of the fruit, and further, that F. G. having agreed that the order of loading should be varied from that provided in the charter-party, the pursuers were not entitled to found on any damage resulting from the variation. Feb. 19, 1897.
Lindsay & Son
v. Scholefield.

Held, after a proof (in affirming the judgment of Lord Kyllachy), (1) that the agreement between F. G. and the master was not binding on the pursuers, and (2) that the defenders were liable in respect that they had undertaken to deliver in good order and condition, and had failed to do so, or to prove that the damage was due to one of the excepted causes.

By charter-party dated 6th November 1895 between Henry 2ND DIVISION. Scholefield & Son, managing owners of the steamship "Andalusia," Ld. Kyllachy. of Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the one part, and James Lindsay & Son, fruit salesmen, Edinburgh, on the other part, it was mutually agreed that the said steamer should proceed to Seville and there load from the charterers or their agents 1500 half chests of oranges, and being so loaded should proceed to Leith direct, and deliver the same agreeably to bills of lading. "Steamer to load as fast as she can receive, as customary, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), and to be discharged, as customary, as fast as steamer can deliver, in a safe berth as ordered by charterers. . . . Steamer to have her holds properly cleaned before loading fruit, and she shall not be ballasted with sand or mud, or anything prejudicial to the cargo, but has liberty to load lead or mineral before loading fruit, also cork-wood, for owners' benefit, same to be discharged after the fruit. Ballast to be properly separated from oranges and other cargo. . . . Should anything occur to the steamer after the fruit is shipped, causing her to be detained at any port or place more than twenty-four hours, captain, if practicable, shall instantly telegraph information of same to the charterers, and, in any case, give them earliest possible advice; the owners shall also be bound, if delay exceeds seven days, to allow the charterers the option of forwarding the cargo immediately by some other steamer, and if at less than chartered freight the steamer to receive the difference, less cost of transhipment. In the event of the steamer breaking down whilst at sea with fruit on board, the captain is bound to avail himself of assistance offered to tow or otherwise to enable him to reach his destination with the least delay possible."

On the margin of the charter-party there was written—"The captain to apply to Mr Francisco Gomez, La Productora Exportadora de Naranjas, Seville, for cargo."

The bills of lading for the oranges bore that they were "shipped in good order and well-conditioned, . . . and are to be delivered in the like good order and well-conditioned," subject to specified exceptions, including (written by the master) "weight, quantity, and quality unknown. Not responsible for leakage, rust, or inherent deterioration."

On delivery at Leith the oranges were found to be in a damaged condition.

In December 1895 Lindsay & Son brought an action against the owners of the "Andalusia," concluding for £304, 15s. as the amount of the loss sustained through the damaged condition of the oranges when delivered.

The pursuers averred that the damage to the oranges was caused

No. 98. by the insufficient means of ventilation on board the vessel, and to the undue detention of the oranges in the vessel in consequence of the other cargo having (in breach of the charter-party) been loaded after the oranges, and discharged at Leith before them.

Feb. 19, 1897.
Lindsay & Son
v. Scholefield.

The defenders admitted that the other cargo had been loaded after the oranges, and that some of it had been discharged before them, but they averred that "the oranges were shipped before the rest of the cargo, with the knowledge and express approval of the shipper, who represented to the captain that as the oranges were all upon the quay, and exposed to the weather, it would be better that they should be put into the ship's holds, in the event of bad weather coming on. The captain assented to this, and the oranges were accordingly put into the holds." The defenders further founded on the exemption above quoted in the bill of lading, and alleged that when shipped the oranges were in a condition of "inherent deterioration."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having received the goods in question in good order and condition, and having failed to deliver same in like good order and condition, as above set forth, and the pursuers having in consequence suffered loss and damage to the amount sued for, decree ought to be granted, as craved. (2) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the extent sued for owing to the fault and breach of contract of the defenders, are entitled to decree, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuers not having suffered any loss owing to the fault or breach of contract of the defenders, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

A proof was allowed. The evidence disclosed the following facts:—The steamer arrived at Seville, and was ready to load on the 15th November. But she had to wait her turn for her mineral cargo, which turn did not arrive until the 18th. In these circumstances the captain arranged with Gomez, the shipper of the fruit (who had at that time no copy of the charter-party), that the fruit should be loaded at once; and it accordingly was so loaded on the 15th, 16th, and 17th November, and stowed at the fore and aft ends of the hold. The cork-wood, or part of it, was put on board simultaneously, and placed fore and aft between the oranges and the fore and aft hatches. On the 18th the mineral began to be loaded, and the loading occupied five days, being completed on the evening of the 22d, by which time also the deck cargo of cork had been put on board. The steamer did not sail until the 23d. The result was that the oranges, which, if loaded last in terms of the charter, would have been only (on the average) one and a half days stowed in the vessel's hold before sailing, were in fact in that position for (on the average) six and a half days before sailing. Similarly at discharge, the cork-wood had to be discharged first, and in consequence the oranges were kept on board for at least an additional twelve hours. Altogether the voyage, as regarded the oranges, was prolonged by about six days beyond the period permitted by the charter.

The import of the evidence quoad ultra sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

On 28th November 1896, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) decerned against the defenders for £157 in full of the sum sued for.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—In so far as the damage was due to the oranges having been in the hold for six days more than they would have been had they been loaded in terms of the charter-party, the defenders were not liable, for Gomez, the agent of the pursuers, had consented to this deviation from the charter-party. It was a deviation within his powers, for it was not a radical alteration, merely a variation in detail.¹ The pursuers' remedy, if they had any, was against their own agent Gomez. But if Gomez did not bind the pursuers so neither did the captain bind the defenders.² [LORD TRAYNER.—No. The charterers' agent and the captain are not in pari casu. You, as shipowner, are responsible for the breach of the contract by the person to whom you entrusted the execution of the contract at this port, namely, your captain.] The shipowners were not responsible if their captain, without their authority, did not fulfil their contract. [LORD YOUNG.—Then you did not fulfil your contract. You should have had an agent who would have done so.] In any view, the defenders were not responsible, since the loss was due to the inherent consented to the change made in the order of loading. Now I shall assume that that is proved. I am not, I confess, prepared to accept the captain's account of the shipper's motive. I think the weight of the evidence is against the suggestion that the oranges, or any material part of them, were at this time lying on the quay exposed to the weather. But that, for one reason or another, the shipper did consent to the fruit being shipped first is, I think, sufficiently proved. Indeed, the shipper Gomez admits the fact, although he says that his consent proceeded on the condition, or at least on the understanding, that the steamer should load her mineral and sail within twenty-four hours after the fruit was stowed.

"The question, however, is whether it was in the power of the shipper (charterers' agent although quoad hoc he may be held to be) to discharge or vary material conditions of the charter. I am not able so to hold. That an agent constituted by a charter, for the purposes of the charter, can without special authority alter the charter seems to me to be a startling proposition. I asked at the discussion if there was any authority for it, and the only case which was quoted was the case of Sickens, 29 Law J. (C. P.), 25. But that case seems to me to be an authority the other way. No doubt the liberty there taken by the charterers' agent was rather larger than that taken here. But the question is hardly one of degree. Deviations that are not material may not perhaps count, but, subject to that qualification, the principle, I think, is as expressed by Chief Justice Erle in the case referred to, where he points out that 'if the plaintiff's counsel had succeeded in his argument, it might have thrown doubt upon the well known, and in mercantile transactions most important, rule, that the power of a special agent to bind his principal is limited by the authority given to that agent.'

"The owners being therefore, with respect to the order of loading, in breach of the charter, the next point which seems reasonably clear is, I think, this,—that although the necessary result of the change in the order of loading was to make the ventilation of the oranges during the voyage more important and also more difficult, the ventilation provided was certainly not such as to redress the difficulty. As to the amount of ventilation, there was certainly a good deal of looseness, and perhaps also a good deal of exaggeration, on both sides ; but taking even the testimony of the owners' witnesses, it must, I think, be allowed that for such a cargo, stowed as this cargo was, the ventilation provided was, to say the least, somewhat scrimp.

No. 98. deterioration of the oranges. [LORD TRAYNER.—What do you understand by “inherent deterioration?”] Such a condition existing in the oranges when they were put on board as would lead to their decay through the operation of ordinary causes. [LORD TRAYNER.—But that definition would apply to all oranges that could be put on board, for they would necessarily have the seeds of decay in them as soon as they were plucked. You must interpret the expression in a reasonable sense.] The evidence, fairly read, shewed that the oranges were in a bad condition, and not fit for carriage when they were put on board. Lastly, the pursuers had failed to prove that the means of ventilation were insufficient.

Lindsay & Son
v. Scholesfield.

Argued for the pursuers;—Assuming that Gomez, the shipper of the fruit, was the charterers’ agent, he was a special agent, for the limited purpose of seeing to the loading of the cargo in terms of the charter-party; he had no authority to vary the terms of the charter-party, at least in any essential particular, which the variation in question certainly was. The whole tenor of the charter-party made it plain that despatch was of the essence of the contract. On the question as to the cause of the deterioration, the Lord Ordinary had

It may be that the cork-wood was loosely stowed in the hatches, and that from the hatches to the ventilators—fore and aft—there was a certain air space along the top of the cork-wood and the top of the oranges, that air space ranging up to 12 or even 18 inches. It may also be the case that the cork-wood and oranges were not actually in contact, and that there was a space of a few inches, or in some places as much as 12 inches, between them. Still it cannot be said that there was anything like full and free ventilation. It certainly cannot be said that the fruit had the same chance of full ventilation as it would have had if stowed last, and therefore under and next to the hatches, instead of some distance away from them. In short the ventilation might have sufficed under favourable conditions, but it hardly, I think, sufficed for fruit which had been stowed for 6½ days before sailing, and which was placed and stowed as was the case here.

“I therefore come to the conclusion that the owners were in default, and are liable in such damages as the charterers can instruct. The remaining question in the case is whether, and how far, damage has been proved.

“On this head the prima facie view is, of course, necessarily with the charterers. The oranges unquestionably arrived in very bad condition. Unquestionably, also, their condition was such as usually results from, and would be explained by, an unduly prolonged voyage, or insufficient ventilation—insufficient, I mean, with reference to the conditions of the voyage. At the same time it is of course possible that the true cause of the deterioration of the fruit was something different, and that, conceding the ship’s default, that default may be shewn to have been in result immaterial. Accordingly such, as I understand it, is the case which the shipowners make. They say that the season of 1895 was a bad season—that the orange crop had suffered from rains as it approached maturity, and that in consequence other cargoes which had every justice done them fetched no more in the market than the cargo in question. They say also, and separately, that had the oranges been shipped in terms of the charter—that is to say, after the cork-wood and mineral—they would, as it turned out, have been exposed to weather which would probably have done them more harm than their confinement for six extra days in the ship’s hold.

“There has been a good deal of evidence led on the point thus raised, and I have carefully considered it. But the result is that I do not consider that the shipowners have succeeded in displacing the natural inferences which arise from the condition and history of this cargo. . . . ” reached the sound conclusion on the evidence, but it was not necessary for the pursuers to put their case so high. The defenders had accepted the fruit as in good order and condition, and had undertaken to deliver it in the like good order and condition. This they had not done, and they were therefore liable unless they proved that they were within one or other of the excepted causes. This they had failed to prove.

Lindsay & Son
v. Scholefield.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—By charter-party between the pursuers and the defenders the steamship “Andalusia,” belonging to the defenders, was chartered to carry a quantity of oranges for the pursuers from Seville to Leith. Under the charter-party the defenders had liberty to load minerals and also cork-wood on their own account, but it was stipulated that this additional cargo should be loaded before the fruit and discharged after it. What actually happened was this: By arrangement between the master of the vessel and Gomez, the shipper of the fruit, the fruit was loaded before the rest of the cargo, and consequently some of the other cargo was discharged before the fruit, with the result that the fruit was on board for about six days longer than it would have been had it been loaded in the manner provided in the charter-party. When it reached Leith the fruit was found to be in a much deteriorated condition, and the pursuers have in consequence brought this action, in which they claim damages from the defenders, alleging that the deteriorated condition of the fruit was due to the prolonged detention on board consequent on the violation of the charter-party and the insufficient means of ventilation on board. The defenders deny that the ventilation of their ship was defective, and they say further that the deterioration of the fruit was caused by “inherent deterioration,” which is one of the exemptions from liability for which they stipulated in the bills of lading. The defenders also maintain that if the deviation from the charter-party either caused or contributed to the injury of the fruit, they are nevertheless not responsible, seeing that the pursuers, through their agent Gomez, assented to the deviation.

The first question is as to whether the fruit, when it was put on board, was in good order and condition, or was in a condition of inherent deterioration. I can see no ground in the evidence for saying that the fruit was in a condition of inherent deterioration,—that is to say, that it was in such a condition when it was put on board that it would become bad within an unduly short time independently of any other cause of deterioration coming into operation after it was put on board. I can find no ground for holding that it was in such a condition, and I am of opinion therefore that the defence that the damaged state of the fruit was due to its inherent deterioration fails. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the deterioration was caused by the fruit being put on board too soon and discharged too late, contrary to the provisions of the charter-party, coupled with the insufficient means of ventilation on board. On this last point the evidence is conflicting, but I see no ground for doubting the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's view that the means of ventilation were unsatisfactory, or as his Lordship expresses it, “somewhat scrimp.” In the view I take of the case, however, it is not necessary to come to a conclusion on that matter. It is sufficient, in my opinion, that the fruit was not loaded in the manner provided in the

No. 98. charter-party,—for it cannot be doubted that the natural result of its being nearly a week longer on board would be deterioration, and that the defenders have failed to shew that the fruit was in a condition of inherent deterioration when it was put on board.

Feb. 19, 1897.
Lindsay & Son
v. Scholefield.

There only remains the question as to the effect of the agreement between the master and Gomez. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that Gomez had no authority to consent to such an alteration of the charter-party to the effect of binding the charterers, and I am of opinion that the responsibility for the consequences of the deviation lies with the shipowners, who, through their master, took the fruit on board in a manner contrary to the stipulations of the charter-party.

On the whole matter, I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the parties was that this vessel should be primarily a fruit-carrying vessel, with a limited permission to the shipowners to load other cargo; and accordingly the charter-party contains very distinct provisions with the view of carrying out this object. It is provided that the fruit should be loaded last and taken out first, the obvious intention being that it should be on board for as short a time as possible. In point of fact the fruit was put on board first and was not taken out first, with the consequence that it was on board for nearly a week longer than it would otherwise have been. The defenders say that this violation of the contract was due to an arrangement between the master of the ship and Gomez, the agent of the charterers, but I am of opinion that such an arrangement does not justify or excuse the breach of contract on the part of the shipowners. I also agree that the fruit was certainly, according to the evidence, in a bad condition when it reached Leith. That, I understand, was not disputed. Then the bills of lading bear that the fruit was shipped in "good order and well conditioned," and the shipowners undertake to deliver it in the like good order and well conditioned, which, as I have said, they did not do. I do not say that that leads necessarily to the liability of the shipowners, but I think it does unless they shew that the damaged condition of the fruit is reasonably to be accounted for by some cause for which they are not responsible. But so far from there being any evidence to shew that the damaged condition of the fruit was due to a cause for which the shipowners are not responsible, I think that the evidence shews that the fruit was sound and wholesome when it was put on board, and that the reasonable conclusion is that its condition when it arrived at Leith was due to the violation of the provisions of the charter-party, which I cannot doubt were inserted for the very purpose of preventing just such a deterioration in the fruit as actually occurred. On the whole matter I agree that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. The Lord Ordinary's view rather appears to be that it is proved that the damaged condition of the fruit was due to the shipowners' breach of contract in loading the fruit before and not after the other cargo, and to their neglect to provide sufficient means of ventilation. I do not in the least question that ground of judgment, but I am of opinion that the pursuers would equally be entitled to prevail, even although they have not proved substantively that the damage was due to the shipowners' breach of contract. The charter-party provides that the fruit should be delivered "agreeably to bills of lading," and the bills of lading acknowledge that the fruit has been "shipped in good order and well conditioned," and take the shipowners bound to deliver in the like good order and well conditioned, subject to certain specified exceptions. If therefore the fruit is not delivered in the like good order and well conditioned, the shipowners must shew that the damage was due to one or other of the excepted causes either as specified in the charter-party or in the bills of lading, otherwise they are responsible for the damage. Now, the only exception upon which the defenders founded is contained in the words inserted in manuscript on the bill of lading, "not responsible for inherent deterioration." I agree that these words are a qualification of the obligation to deliver. Having inserted the exception, the defenders are entitled to any benefit which they can derive from the insertion. But when I asked what was the meaning of the words, the answer was that they exempted the shipowners from responsibility for damages due to defects existing in the cargo at the time it was shipped. Now, if the shipowners could prove that the fruit when it was shipped was in such a condition as would necessarily or reasonably lead to the result which was disclosed at Leith, that would be an excellent answer to the pursuers. But I am very far indeed from thinking that the defenders have been successful in shewing this. I think the evidence shews that the fruit was plucked at the proper time, and in good condition, and was packed in good order and carefully, and that there was no inherent deterioration.

Therefore taking this simple ground of judgment, I think the pursuers are entitled to prevail. I think that the defenders having undertaken to deliver in good order and condition, and not having done this, are liable unless they bring themselves within one of the excepted causes, and this I think they have failed to do. But while I proceed on this ground, I repeat that there is nothing in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, either in fact or in law, to which I do not assent.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree. I assent to the Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment, but I am quite prepared to put the judgment on the simple ground adopted by Lord Young and Lord Trayner.

THE COURT adhered.

Feb. 23, 1897.
County Council of County of Elgin v. Magistrates of Elgin.

The Local Government Act, 1889, section 11 (1) vests the whole powers of the commissioners of supply in the county council "save as herein-after mentioned," and section 18 (5) provides that the standing joint committee of the county council and commissioners of supply shall be deemed to be the police committee under the Police Act, 1857.

In 1893 an agreement was entered into between a county council and the police commissioners of a burgh for the consolidation of the county and burgh police, it being provided that the police commissioners of the burgh should have right to appoint three of their number to be members of the standing joint committee.

Held that the burgh representatives were entitled to sit as members of the standing joint committee when acting as the police committee, but that they were not entitled to do so when the joint committee was transacting other county business, and therefore that the burgh representatives were not entitled to vote in the election of the permanent chairman of the standing joint committee.

1st DIVISION. In March 1893 the County Council of the county of Elgin and the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of the city and royal burgh of Elgin, which had a population of more than 7000, entered into a minute of agreement to the effect that the police establishments of the county and burgh of Elgin should be consolidated, as from and after 1st March 1893. Until the date of the agreement the Magistrates and Town-council of the burgh, as the Commissioners of Police acting under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, maintained a separate police force.

By the minute of agreement it was, inter alia, agreed "that the second party [the Magistrates] shall have right to appoint three of their number to be members of the Standing Joint Committee of the county of Elgin, but shall not be entitled to vote or act on any matters or things under section 18, subsections 6 and 7, of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889."

The agreement was duly carried into effect. Thereafter the burgh of Elgin did not maintain a separate police force, and it sent three representatives to the Standing Joint Committee of the County Council. These representatives were regularly summoned to and attended the meetings of the Standing Joint Committee at which police business was dealt with. Their right to sit and vote at such meetings was however called in question on 3d June 1895, when a doubt was suggested as to the legality of their attending the meetings, and, in any case, as to the legality of their voting at the election of a chairman of the Standing Joint Committee.

In consequence of this doubt, a special case was presented by the County Council of Elgin, of the first part, and the Magistrates, &c., of the burgh of Elgin, of the second part, which set forth the facts before narrated.

The first parties maintained that the clause in the agreement entitling the second parties to appoint three of their number to be members of the Standing Joint Committee was ultra vires, and could not receive effect.

The second parties maintained that the agreement was legal and binding. No. 99.

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—“(1) Are the second parties entitled to appoint three of their number to be members of the Standing Joint Committee of the county of Elgin when acting as the Police Committee under the Police Act, 1857? and (2) If the preceding question is answered in the affirmative, are the members so appointed by the second parties entitled to vote in the election of the chairman of the Standing Joint Committee, or at any rate to do so when it is acting as the Police Committee under the Police Act, 1857?”

County Council of Elgin v. Magistrates of Elgin.

The under-noted sections of the Police (Scotland) Act, 1857, and the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, were, inter alia, referred to by the parties.*

* The Police (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 72), enacts, section 2,—“The commissioners of supply of every county shall . . . appoint certain of their own number, being not more than fifteen and not less than three, which persons so appointed . . . shall be called ‘the police committee,’ . . . and such police committee shall elect one of their own number to be their chairman. . . .”

Section 61.—“It shall be lawful for the commissioners of supply of any county, and for the magistrates and town-council of any burgh situated in or adjoining to such county, to agree together for the consolidation of the county and burgh police establishments . . . and the magistrates and council of the burgh shall thereupon forthwith . . . appoint to be members of the police committee hereinbefore mentioned one or more of their number as may have been fixed in such agreement who . . . shall have the like powers as members of such committee with the members appointed by the commissioners of supply. . . .”

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), enacts, section 11,—“Subject to the provision of this Act, there shall be transferred to and vested in the council of each county, on and after the appointed day, or at such times as are in this Act in that behalf respectively specified, (1) the whole powers and duties of the commissioners of supply, save as hereinafter mentioned”

Section 18.—“(1) For the purposes in this section mentioned, and with respect to the powers of borrowing transferred or conferred by this Act, or any other Act, there shall be a standing joint committee of the county council and the commissioners of supply, consisting of such number of county councillors, not exceeding seven, as shall be appointed by the county council annually at their meeting in the month of May, and such number of commissioners of supply, not exceeding seven, as shall be appointed by the commissioners of supply annually at their meeting on the same day. Six shall form a quorum of the committee, and the committee may act notwithstanding any vacancy upon it. (2) The Sheriff of the county (or in his absence one of his substitutes to be by him nominated for that purpose) shall be ex officio a member of the said standing joint committee, and the committee shall elect one of their own number to be chairman thereof. . . . Feb. 23, 1897.
County Council of Elgin v. Magistrates of Elgin.

Argued for the County Council ;—The clause in the 61st section of the Act 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 72, which made provision for a burgh being directly represented upon the police committee constituted under that Act, had no application to the standing joint committee constituted under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889. The composition of the standing joint committee was laid down by section 18 (1) and (2) of that Act, and no one could be on the committee for any purpose whatever, except those mentioned in the section. There was nothing in the section to suggest that there were to be added to it any members by agreement for special purposes. Further, the Local Government Act contained exhaustive provisions with reference to the representation of burghs in county councils, and the proper course was for the burgh to be represented on the county council under section 8, which by subsection 3 applied to “any burgh which contains a population of more than 7000, but does not maintain a separate police force.” The burgh representatives on the county council would then be eligible for election to the standing joint committee in the same way as the other county councillors. In addition to its duties in connection with the police, the standing joint committee had important duties to perform with which the county was alone concerned, and which would render any direct representation on the part of a burgh quite inappropriate. The agreement no doubt excepted some of these from the cognisance of the burgh's representatives, but it was silent as regarded others, in particular the power of borrowing money. Alternatively, if the police commissioners were entitled to be directly represented on the standing joint committee, these representatives were not entitled to vote in the election of the chairman of the standing joint committee. The standing joint committee was one body for all purposes. It had only one chairman (1889 Act, section 18, subsection 2). There could not be a second permanent chairman of the committee qua police committee.

The Burgh argued ;—Under the Police Act of 1857, section 2, the commissioners of supply had to appoint certain of their number, “being not more than fifteen and not less than three,” who along with certain official persons were to be “the police committee.” By section 61 of that Act, when a burgh agreed to consolidate its police with the county police, the magistrates and council of the burgh had power annually to appoint “to be members of the police committee herein before mentioned one or more of their number as may have been fixed in such agreement, who, while the agreement subsists, shall have the like powers as members of such committee, with the members appointed by the commissioners of supply.” By section 18 of the Local Government Act of 1889, subsection 5, the standing joint committee was to be “deemed to be” the police committee under the Police Act of 1857, and was to be subject to all the provisions of that Act. By section 97 of the 1889 Act the power of making consoli-

this section. (7) Capital works shall include the erection . . . of buildings, the construction . . . of roads and bridges, &c.”

Section 97.—“Nothing in this Act contained shall be held to abrogate or repeal . . . the consolidations of county and burgh police establishments which have been made under and by virtue of the powers contained in sections 61 and 63 of the same Act (Police Act, 1857) or the power of making such . . . consolidations after the passing of this Act . . .”

tion was expressly reserved. The 1889 Act merely changed the personnel of the committee, and enlarged its area of jurisdiction, and the standing joint committee simply came in the place of the police committee under the Act of 1857, having the same duties and the same powers, and it was equally competent therefore for a burgh to send representatives to the standing joint committee qua police committee as to the police committee under the Act of 1857. Section 8, subsection 3, of the Act of 1889, had no application to the case of the Burgh of Elgin, which could not be represented upon the County Council, and which maintained a separate police force at the date when the Act of 1889 came into operation. There was nothing incongruous in the burgh representatives being members of the standing committee for some purposes, while they were excluded from it for others. The Act expressly recognised members of a committee for special purposes only,—section 78, subsection 3. Further, the burgh representatives, as members of the standing joint committee, were entitled to vote in the election of the chairman of that body, or at any rate to vote in the election of the chairman of that body when it was acting as the police committee “under the Police Act, 1857.”

County Council of Elgin v. Magistrates of Elgin.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case has been very well argued by all the counsel whom we have heard, but I cannot say I think it presents any difficulty for decision. In the 61st section of the Police Act, 1857, it was declared to be lawful for the commissioners of supply, acting in treaty with the town-council of a burgh, to agree upon the consolidation of the county and burgh police forces. In that same section it was provided that as a term of the consolidation agreement it should be arranged that one or more members of the town-council should be appointed as members of the police committee of the county, and sit in that capacity. Now, the question we have to consider is, how far that power has been kept alive and transferred to the county council under the Act of 1889. It seems to me that this has been done with what—perhaps fortuitously—is a remarkable degree of clearness. First of all, as to the power itself, it is expressly carried forward by section 97, because nothing the Act contains is to be held to abrogate the power of making consolidations after passing of this Act. Next, I inquire who then has the power that is carried forward? And the answer to that is plainly to be found in section 11, subsection 1, by which there are transferred to the county council the whole powers of the commissioners of supply, “save as hereinafter mentioned.” “Save as hereinafter mentioned” has no application to the present question.

Well, then, the next question is, shall the powers so transferred have effect in altering the constitution of the committee to which the police forces are entrusted? That question again is specifically answered in section 18, subsection 5, which says that the standing joint committee shall be deemed to be the police committee under the Police Act, 1857, and shall be subject to all the provisions of that Act. One of the provisions of that Act was that there might be introduced into the police committee one or more gentlemen from the consolidating burgh. And therefore it seems to me that the Act has in those three several appropriate places distinctly made plain,—first, that the power of consolidation is to remain; second, by whom it is to be exercised; and third, with what effect upon the police committee. These

No. 99. considerations seem to me to be decisive of the first question in this case, but it is well to attend to the working of the system which is introduced, and the only difficulty in the way of giving free effect to those express provisions is the fact that the new police committee is not merely the police committee, but is the standing joint committee specially constituted, not merely for police purposes but for other purposes which are in the view of the Act of very high importance. The standing joint committee has the very responsible duty of determining whether works involving capital expenditure, which have been decided upon by the county council, shall be authorised, and they have also the power of determining whether the borrowing powers of the county council shall or shall not be exercised. But then, it seems to me that here again the phraseology of the statute clears the difficulty which is thus created. It is quite clear that it would be an anomaly, if not an impossibility, to hold that under the treaty of consolidation relating solely to police there should be seated on the standing joint committee for all purposes these three gentlemen from the burgh, with power to interfere with matters with which they have no concern whatever,—whether works of capital expenditure, not within but outside the burgh and in the county, should be authorised, and whether the county is to be burdened with loans. As I have said, the section clears that, I think, in a very distinct way. It does not say that the standing joint committee shall be for all purposes a police committee—that would be preposterous—that it was to be deemed to be the police committee when sitting to consider whether a loan should be authorised. The true reading is that, as it is intended to vest this body with the powers given to the police committee under the Act of 1857, for the effectuation of these powers it shall be deemed to be the police committee under the Act of 1857. Not that it is, but that it shall be deemed to be, the police committee to execute police functions. Now when we have that before us, it becomes plain that the power which the county council now have is not to introduce people to sit upon the standing joint committee in its general functions, but to place them on it when executing its police duties,—that in short the standing joint committee is, to use an intelligible phrase, in police business, the acting police committee, and then these gentlemen come into their proper place. Now, that is exactly what this agreement has done, and I think the agreement is very well framed, because it expresses what I think would have been implied by law in an agreement which lacked that expression. It says that they shall not be entitled to vote or act on any matters or things under the clauses relating to capital expenditure. I agree with the criticism which was made by Mr Campbell in opening—that the draftsman had better have gone on to have referred to borrowing; but I make bold to say that the law would do what the draftsman omitted to express—that these gentlemen would have no right under this agreement to sit on questions relating to the authorisation of loans. Therefore I am in favour of answering the first query in the affirmative. As regards the second, the process of reasoning by which I arrive at that affirmative answer of the first compels me to limit my affirmation of the second to the second alternative; because, holding as I do that these gentlemen are not introduced into the general business of the standing joint committee, I must go further and say that

These are my views upon this matter, and I should propose to your Lordships to give judgment accordingly.

Stamp—Contract-note—Penalties for insufficient stamping—Action for penalties against individual partners of firm.—The Lord Advocate laid an information against A and B, stockbrokers, carrying on business under the firm name of A, B, & Company, charging “both and each or one or other of them” with having on occasions specified issued contract-notes in the said firm name which were not duly stamped, contrary to the Statutes 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39, sections 1 and 53 (2), and 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 7, section 3, whereby the said A and B had “both and each or one or other of them” incurred fines to amounts stated.

The defenders objected that the information was incompetent as laid, in respect that there was no conclusion against the firm. Held that the information was well laid.

Revenue—Exchequer Prosecutions—Court of Exchequer (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 56), sec. 6.—Question whether an Exchequer prosecution must be tried by a jury.

Lord Advocate
v. Thomson.

The information concluded;—"Whereby the said William Thomson and John Hutcheson have both and each or one or other of them, in respect of each of the eight contraventions above libelled, incurred a fine of £20."

William Thomson lodged answers, in which he denied in the case of each count that he had executed any contract-note as alleged. He also submitted,—"In any event, the action being one of civil jurisdiction, it should be directed against Thomson, Hutcheson, & Company."

John Hutcheson lodged answers to the following effect:—"The alleged contract-notes are referred to for their terms."

"Denied that the advices were contract-notes within the meaning of 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39, or are contrary to the Statutes 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39, secs. 1 and 53 (2), and 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 7, sec. 3."

"Explained that the business was conducted on what is known as the 'cover system.' There was no stock purchased for or on behalf of any such person as Cecil Deacon, and there never was any sale or purchase of any marketable security, as defined in sec. 53 of 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39.*"

"In any event, the action being one of civil jurisdiction, it should be directed against Thomson, Hutcheson, & Company."

Thomson pleaded;—(2) The action is incompetent, et separatim, it is irrelevant. (3) All parties not called.

The like pleas, numbered 1 and 2, were proponed for Hutcheson.

On 5th January the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds for the pursuer upon each of the eight counts of the information, subject to the declaration that the pursuer shall not be entitled to recover more than one fine of £20 sterling under each count; and therefore adjudges the defenders, jointly and severally, to forfeit and pay to the pursuer a sum of £160 sterling, being one fine of £20 sterling in respect of each count of the information; and decerns against the defenders accordingly: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, and modified to three-fourths of the taxed amount thereof," &c.†

* This defence, which was also stated by Thomson, was rejected by the Lord Ordinary, and was not persisted in before the Inner-House.

† "OPINION.—The defence to this suit for penalties under the Stamp Act is two-fold—(1) That the information is badly laid as being directed against the individual partners of a firm without calling the firm itself; and (2) that the documents said to have been insufficiently stamped are not contract-notes within the meaning of the Stamp Act at all. There is a separate defence by one of the partners that he took no part individually in executing or transmitting the alleged contract-notes.

"The first of these defences goes to the competency of the action, and must be considered at the outset.

"Ever since the case of Reed & M'Call v. Douglas, 11th June 1814, Fac. Coll., it has been settled practice that the creditor of a firm in a civil debt cannot sue any of the partners without constituting his debt against the firm. This rule, as explained by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Muir v. Collett, 24 D. 1119, rests on considerations of equity, and especially on these,—that the firm is a separate persona, whose funds are not at the disposal of an individual partner, and that the firm, or the partners not called, may possibly have a good defence against the claim, or be in possession of a discharge. It is obvious that these considerations do not apply with anything

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—On the competency.—The civil delict charged in the information was committed by the firm, and the firm, being a separate persona from the partners,¹ should have been called as defenders. In the Court of Exchequer Act, under which the proceedings were taken, “person” included public or private company.² The proceedings were civil, not criminal. The Crown’s right of imprisonment in the event of the fines incurred not being paid was merely a compulsitor to secure their payment.³ It was derived from the old law, which permitted imprisonment for debt, the right to imprison in respect of Crown debts having been reserved when imprisonment for debt in general was abolished. But proceedings which gave a right of imprisonment merely as a means of enforcing payment were civil, and not criminal.⁴ In a similar case employers had been held responsible for the delict of their servant,⁵ and such responsibility shewed that the delict gave rise to a civil debt. Even like the same force where all the individual partners are called (though the firm is not), and I am not aware that the rule has ever been enforced, except when a selection was made from the partners. It may be well, however, to begin by assuming, as counsel did, that in the case of a civil debt the rule holds even when (as here) all the partners are called as individuals. But the Crown maintains that this is not a civil debt, and on that point I heard an elaborate argument.

“If all cases could be sharply divided into the two categories of civil and criminal, with different kinds of liability attaching to each, there would be a good deal to say for the view that this is simply a civil claim. The Crown demands money, and nothing but money. It demands it in a proceeding which, though peculiar to the Court of Exchequer, follows the course of a civil action. The defenders do not require, as in a proper criminal case, to be personally present at the hearing. The nature of the imprisonment for which, under schedule G of the Exchequer Act, a warrant must be given in the case of failure to pay the sum sued for, is not imprisonment for a definite period, but imprisonment until the money is paid, and this distinction, in the case of summary complaints, is made the test of whether jurisdiction is civil or criminal, by the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act. Lastly, the theory on which this claim is made against two individuals is, not that each is liable only for his own default, which is the ordinary rule of criminal liability, but that each is liable also for the default of the other, or of a clerk or servant of both acting within the scope of his employment, which is the ordinary rule of civil liability.

“It appears to me, however, that the rigid classification of every case as either wholly civil or wholly criminal—a classification appropriate enough in a primitive state of things—has long since been superseded by the complicated course of legislation. The modern statute-book bristles with penalties of fines attached to offences which are typical examples of the malum prohibitum, as opposed to the malum in se. Some of these can only be incurred by personal delinquency; others are incurred through the fault of agents. When incurred, the money is, in one sense, a debt due to the Crown, but none the less does it retain its inherent character as a pecuniary fine imposed by way of punishment for an offence. The proceeding brought

Feb. 23, 1897.
Lord Advocate
v. Thomson.

Argued for the pursuer;—On the competency.—It was unnecessary to call the firm. The real transgressors were the partners, and the charge was rightly directed against them. The civil rule that recourse for payment of a debt could not be had against an individual partner until the debt had been constituted against the firm did not apply where, as here, all the individual partners had been convened into Court, or in proceedings like the present, where the appropriate course was to go against the real transgressors.² Any person who complained of a delict might select the wrongdoer whom he would call to account.³

for the recovery of the fine may be brought in a Court which is ordinarily a civil Court, and may be conducted according to the rules which govern civil actions, yet the proceeding itself is held to be neither wholly civil nor wholly criminal, but partly the one and partly the other. Thus in Lawson v. Jopp, 15 D. 392, a penalty and expenses awarded under the Salmon Fisheries Act of 9 Geo. IV., which together did not amount to £8, 6s. 8d., were held not to be a 'civil debt' in the sense of the Small-Debt Act of 5 and 6 Will. IV., so as to exempt the defenders from imprisonment. It is true that the imprisonment in that case was for a limited period, but that circumstance cannot have been the ratio decidendi, for Lord Colonsay expressed the opinion (at p. 396) that the Small-Debt Act, in mentioning 'civil debts,' was not intended to apply to 'pecuniary mulcts or fines, imposed by way of punishment for crimes or offences, though these may, in a sense, be called debts, and, although the party may be entitled to be relieved from imprisonment on payment.' Similarly, in Whyte v. Simpson, 1 Macph. 72, it was held that a prosecution in the Justice of Peace Court at the instance of an officer of excise for contravention of the Spirits Act of 1860 was not 'a cause depending before any civil Court in Scotland,' in the sense of section 24 of the Exchequer Act, so as to make the Crown liable in expenses, although in that case there was no limitation of the period of imprisonment that was to follow non-payment of the penalties. I do not know that a different decision would have been pronounced after the passing of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, because section 28 of that Act was not intended to alter the character of the offences charged, but only to indicate the proper Court of review. At all events that Act cannot be held to apply to the present proceeding. Again, in Lord Advocate v. Thomson, 20 S. L. R. 3, an information by the Crown, brought in the Court of Exchequer for forfeiture of methylated spirits, under the Spirits Act of 1880, section 129, was held (by Lord Fraser) to partake of the nature of a criminal case to the effect of making the evidence of the accused incompetent.

"The specimen informations appended to the Exchequer Act shew that some conclude for sums forfeited or penalties incurred, and others merely for sums in which the person proceeded against 'is indebted to Her Majesty.' The latter class may fall under the description of civil debts; not so the former. The Stamp Act of 1891, on which this proceeding is founded, declares, section 53 (2), that 'every person who makes or executes

No. 100.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Crown asserts, in the information before us, that both, and each or one or other, of the two individuals named have been guilty of an offence against the Stamp Acts. What both and each or one or other are said to have done was making and executing in the name of their firm, Thomson, Hutcheson, & Company, and transmitting, a contract-note which was not duly stamped. Feb. 23, 1897.
Lord Advocate
v. Thomson.

Now, to take the simplest case, supposing one of the two partners to have executed the contract-note in the firm's name, and to have issued it without being duly stamped, I suppose it cannot be doubted that the individual who did so is liable in the penalty in that behalf exacted. The matter is not substantially complicated if it be supposed that the two partners acted in concert in having the contract-note so signed and issued any contract-note chargeable with duty, and not being duly stamped, shall incur a fine of £20.' That is the appropriate language for creating an offence and imposing a penalty. Consequently, it seems to me that the proceeding for recovery of the fine is sufficiently penal in its character to disentitle the defenders from pleading a rule of practice which is confined to civil debts.

"I asked their counsel what interest they had to plead that the firm should be called. The answer was that they had a double interest—(1) to prevent the full penalty being exacted from each partner; and (2) to take care that the right of one partner paying the fine to obtain relief to the extent of one-half against the other should not be prejudiced.

"With regard to the first of these points, the position of the Crown is not, in my view, satisfactory. Its advisers declined to admit that their right was limited to recovering one fine for each offence. They seemed to go the length of maintaining that if a firm consisted of six partners, and if a contract-note executed by or on behalf of the firm was insufficiently stamped, the Crown would be entitled to exact £120. This is quite extravagant. The plain meaning of the Act of 1891, as amended by the Act of 1893, is that, when any stock or marketable security of the value of £5 or upwards is sold or bought by a broker or agent, a contract-note must be executed by the agent and transmitted to the principal; that it must bear a penny stamp if the value is below £100, and a shilling stamp if the value is £100 or upwards; and that if either no contract-note is made, or if it is insufficiently stamped, a fine of £20 shall be incurred. Obviously the stamping of the document is clerk's work, and if the prohibited thing is done in the ordinary course of the broker's business the fine is incurred whether it is done by or for the broker. There is no valid distinction between this case and such cases as Advocate-General v. Grant, 15 D. 980, which related to a penalty under the Excise Act of 1832, and Lord Advocate v. Thomson already cited. If the rule were otherwise, the door would be opened to unlimited evasion of the law. But it is equally plain that a fine which may be incurred thus vicariously must be a single fine, and has nothing to do with the number of persons in whose interest the thing is done. The Crown cannot have it both ways. I shall take care in the judgment I am to pronounce that the right to recover is limited to one fine for each offence. Accordingly, the defenders' interest to state their plea on that ground disappears.

"With regard to the other ground, there can be no apprehension, I should think, since the case of the Wick and Pulteneytown Shipping Company, 20 R. 275, affd. 21 R. (H. L.) 39, that there is any bar to a co-delinquent's right of relief, where his acts are not tainted by fraud or moral delinquency.

"Accordingly, it seems to me that the defenders have no appreciable interest to state their preliminary plea. It is an equitable plea, and if

No. 100. unstamped, although the firm signature would necessarily be adhibited by one of the two. In this case again both the two individuals have transgressed the law, and each is severally liable to prosecution.

Feb. 23, 1897.
Lord Advocate
v. Thomson.

These very plain and obvious considerations make it impossible for me to sustain the plea that this prosecution is incompetent because the firm is not sued for the penalties. I am not here required to consider whether the Crown might not, if it had so chosen, have sued the firm, although I should consider this a much more doubtful question than the present. But if it be legally possible for an individual to contravene the Stamp Act by making and issuing in his firm's name an unstamped contract, then we cannot throw out this proceeding, which asserts that this has been done.

Whether, supposing both partners, or only one partner, to have incurred the penalty, the company funds would be properly chargeable with the amount, is a question with which the Crown has nothing to do. If the Crown succeed in proving a contravention against both or either of the two individual partners, it will be entitled to a judgment against each person convicted for a penalty, which can be recovered out of all that belongs to him. How the two may settle their accounts inter se, the Crown has no need to anticipate or interest to consider.

It was allowed by the learned counsel for the Crown that, while there is no real dispute about the facts, yet there is no plea of guilty on the record, and accordingly that the interlocutor is premature and must be recalled. We can only in the meantime repel the second and third pleas for Thomson, and the first and second pleas for Hutcheson, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as shall be just.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the whole of your Lordship's observations. I should like to add for the consideration of the Lord Ordinary—because we are not called upon to decide the point—whether it is not a necessary part of the proceedings in Exchequer prosecutions that disputes on matters of fact should be referred to a jury. The point was touched upon in debate, and at least deserves to be looked into, for I must say that, as at present advised, I do not see that any other course can be followed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, repelled the second and third pleas in law for the defender Thomson, and the first and second pleas in law for the defender Hutcheson, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as might be just.

there be no equity to support it, it ought to fail. That is, I rather think, a short but sufficient answer to it, for, even if the defenders' argument that the proceeding is a purely civil one were sound, the want of interest would seem to deprive the plea of all validity. But in my view the proceeding is not a purely civil one. It is civil only in some respects, its main quality being criminal, or, as I should prefer to call it, penal.

"If the proceeding be a competent one, the only remaining question is whether the defenders, or either of them, have stated any good answer on the merits. I am of opinion that they have not. . . ."

Fishings—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 97), sec. 6, subsec. 6—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), Schedule F—Statute—Possession—Width of cruives—Old decree regulating width—Subsequent regulation by Commissioners.—By section 6, subsection 6, of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862; the Commissioners were empowered “to make general regulations with respect to . . . the construction and use of cruives . . . provided that such regulations shall not interfere with any rights held at the time of the passing of this Act under royal grant or charter, or possessed for time immemorial.”

By schedule F of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, a regulation of the Commissioners that no cruive should be less than four feet broad at any part of it was ratified, in so far as consistent with the Act of 1862.

Held that a proprietor of cruive fishings under Crown charters of ancient date, which did not specify the width of the cruives, who had since 1774 exercised his right in accordance with a finding of the Court of that date (in an action of declarator) that the cruives should not be less than 37 inches in width, was not exempted from the regulation in schedule F by the proviso in subsec. 6.

Fishings—River—Cruives.—The proprietor of lands on both banks of a river and of the cruive fishings thereon, in an action of declarator in 1774, was found entitled to keep the cruives at a width of 37 inches, and to withdraw water from the river at the cruive dyke by a lade for the purpose of driving a mill, the entry of the lade to be two feet above the bed of the river.

By the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, cruives were required to be four feet wide.

In a special case presented in 1896, held that the proprietor was bound, when required by the Fishery Board, to widen the cruives to four feet, although it was admitted that the change would diminish the flow of water in the lade, diss. Lord Adam, who was of opinion that the proprietor was entitled to keep the cruives of the width of 37 inches, but not to use them when of that width for fishing purposes.

In November 1896 a special case was presented by the Duke of 1ST DIVISION.
Fife, first party, and by Francis George, solicitor, Banff, clerk to the Fishery Board of the district of the River Deveron, second party, for the determination of the question whether certain cruives on the River Deveron belonging to the Duke were subject to the statutory regulations after mentioned.

By section 6 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 97), it is enacted that,—“The Commissioners shall have the powers and perform the duties hereinafter specified,—that is to say, . . . (6) to make general regulations with respect to the following matters, viz.:—The due observance of the weekly close time; the construction and use of cruives; the construction and alteration of mill-dams or lades or water-wheels, so as to afford a reasonable means for the passage of salmon; the meshes of nets (so that they shall not intercept smolts or salmon fry); obstructions in rivers or estuaries to the passage of salmon; provided that such regulations shall not interfere with any rights held at the time of the passing of this Act under royal grant or charter or possessed for time immemorial.”

By section 10 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), it is enacted,—“The bye-laws contained in the

v. George.

schedules A, B, C, D, E, F, and G to this Act annexed, shall in all respects be held to have been duly made and published, but only in so far as consistent with and authorised by the recited Acts," viz., the said Act 25 and 26 Vict. c. 97; 26 and 27 Vict. c. 50; and 27 and 28 Vict. c. 118, "and to such extent shall be as valid and binding as if the same had been expressly enacted in this Act."

The schedule F of the said Act is in the following terms, viz.:—
"We, the Commissioners appointed under the said Acts, and empowered thereby 'to make general regulations with respect to the construction and use of cruives,' do hereby make the following general regulations with respect to the construction and use of cruives:—

. . . II. No cruive shall be less at any part of it than four feet broad in the clear, provided that where an upright post is used to support the cruive, thereby dividing the width into two parts, the aggregate width exclusive of such post shall not be less than four feet."

The first party maintained that article 2 in schedule F requiring cruives to be four feet wide would interfere with rights held by him at the time of the passing of the Act under royal grant or charter or possessed for time immemorial, and that he was protected from its application by the proviso in section 6 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862.

The case contained the following joint statement:—"The first party is proprietor, in virtue of royal grants or charters of very ancient dates, of the salmon-fishings in the River Deveron, from the sea for about four miles upwards. The said royal grants or charters, and the titles of the first party and his predecessors connecting therewith, comprehend the right of fishing both by cruives and by net and coble. The first party is also proprietor of the lands on both sides of the river for the same extent. The cruive dyke belonging to the first party is situated on the said River Deveron, about two miles from the sea, near to the Rack Mill, in the parish and county of Banff."

"In an action of declarator in the Court of Session, at the instance of Lord Banff and others, proprietors of upper fishings in said river, against James second Earl of Fife, the predecessor of the first party, then in possession of said fishings and cruives, raised for the purpose of regulating the position, dimensions, and use of the cruives and cruive dyke then belonging to the said Earl, and now belonging to the first party, and to prevent the withdrawal of water from the river at said cruive dyke by a lade for the said Rack Mill, the Court, by interlocutors dated 16th February and 8th December 1773, and 4th August 1774, found that the defender James Earl of Fife, and his tacksmen, were entitled to maintain and uphold the cruive dyke now belonging to the first party in the form and shape in which it then was, but that the defenders were bound to place three cruives at least in the said dyke; that each of these cruives must be an ell in height and an ell in breadth."

"By the said interlocutors it was found that the said Earl of Fife was entitled to withdraw water from the river at the cruive dyke by a lade for the purpose of driving the said Rack Mill belonging to his lordship, the entry to the mill lade from the river to be two feet above the bed of the river. The said interlocutors were, on an appeal by the pursuers Lord Banff and others, affirmed by the House of Lords in the year 1781."

"The first party and his predecessors, proprietors of the said cruive dyke, cruives, and fishings, have uninterruptedly maintained, under and in virtue of the said interlocutors of the Court, the three cruives of the width of an ell (37 inches) each, in terms of the said interlocutors. During the weekly close time, the inscales have been taken out or removed in terms of the said interlocutors." No. 101.

Duke of Fife
v. George.

"The parties are agreed that the widening of the cruives to 4 feet would, by lessening the pressure of water, assist the free passage of fish; but if the cruives are so widened, the first party's water supply for Rack Mill, his right to which was judicially affirmed by the interlocutors above referred to, will, or may, be prejudiced during the summer months."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—" (1) Is the first party entitled, in the circumstances set forth, to maintain and continue to use the said cruives at their present width? or (2) Is the first party bound, when called upon to do so by the Fishery Board represented by the second party, to widen the said cruives to a width of four feet each? or (3) Is the said Fishery Board entitled so to widen the said cruives?"

Argued for the second party;—The regulation in schedule F did not alter or prejudice the first party's rights in the sense of the proviso in the Act of 1862. When the regulation of 37 inches for the width of the cruives was laid down, it was laid down by the only Court competent to do so. The origin then of the cruives being a decree of Court regulative of possession, the first party could scarcely plead that his right was founded on immemorial possession. Moreover, his charters were not said to contain any specific regulations as to the size of the cruives. The Act of 1862 introduced a new system of regulations, and must be given effect to. The first party's interpretation of the proviso would render null the enacting part of the statute.¹ The meaning of the proviso was just that the Commissioners could not under the guise of a regulation diminish the rights of a proprietor of salmon-fishing. (2) The first party must bear the expense of altering the cruives in conformity with the schedule.¹

Argued for the first party;—The extent of his rights had been defined by the decree of the Court of Session and the House of Lords explaining the royal grants, and it must be held to have been competently fixed for all time coming. The case then fell exactly within the words of the proviso, which would receive no meaning whatever if the second party's contention was sustained. In *Kennedy's*¹ case possession was required to explain the use. Here there was immemorial possession of a defined use. Further, it was admitted that the widening of the cruives would diminish the first party's water supply.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The main question raised by this special case is, whether the first party is entitled to maintain and continue to use his cruives at their existing size, which is 37 inches, or is bound to conform to the regulations of the Commissioners, which require cruives to be of the width of 4 feet.

Now, de facto, the Duke's cruives, 37 inches wide, have been there for upwards of a hundred years; but then their origin is very clearly shewn in the special case. The first party does not ascribe the size of the cruives to any specific provision to that effect in the royal charters under which he is in right of his salmon-fishings. On the contrary, the size of 37 inches was laid down by the Court of Session in the decree mentioned on record; and from the terms of the decree, it is clear that the Court prescribed cruives of this size by way of equitably harmonizing the exercise of the rights of the Earl of Fife with the interests of the upper riparian proprietors. In short, the provision of the 37 inch cruives was a regulation laid down by the Court of Session, which was then the only body competent to do, in particular cases, what is now done by the Commissioners through general regulations. I do not think, therefore, that the first party can be said to have any right to this particular size of cruive under his charters; and I do not think that the mere fact of the cruives having been there since 1774 discloses a case of a right possessed for time immemorial in the sense of the Act, especially when the origin of the cruives is seen to have been a decree regulative of possession. The Act of 1862 introduces a new system of regulation; and regulations made under it apply not merely to structures to be erected in the future, but to existing structures, as was held in the case of Kennedy v. Murray.¹ This being so, I see nothing in the history of the cruives now under consideration to afford to them any immunity from the regulations of the Commissioners.

A special point was made regarding the effect of widening the cruives on the flow of water into the mill-lade. But I suppose the necessary result of widening cruives is to affect the flow of the water; and this is one of the incidental results of the regulations which must be submitted to. Here, again, the first party has no special right conferred by charter which places his mill-lades in a protected position. The provision in the decree which relates to this matter is again of a regulative character, confers no immunity, and does not denote any right of the character which is safeguarded in the Act of 1862.

I am, therefore, for answering the first question in the negative. It was decided in the case of *Kennedy*¹ that the cost of the operations necessary to produce conformity with the regulations falls on the proprietor; and therefore the second query should be answered in the affirmative. This does not necessarily imply that the board might not be entitled, in case of failure on the part of the proprietor, themselves to widen the cruives; and therefore, considered in the abstract, the third query is not properly alternative to the second. But it is so put, and no circumstances are stated as giving rise to it, except the contention of the first party on the question of expense. Accordingly I think that we should hold it to be superseded.

LORD ADAM.—By sec. 6, subsec. 6, of the Fisheries Act of 1862, the Commissioners are directed to make general regulations with respect to, inter alia, the construction and use of cruives, provided that such regulations shall not interfere with any rights held under royal grant or charter or possessed from time immemorial.

The right of cruive fishing, and, so far as I know, all other rights of salmon-fishing, are exercised under conditions and regulations imposed by

Act of Parliament, or otherwise any alteration of such conditions and regulations would, in one sense, be an interference with such rights of salmon-fishing. If that be the meaning of the Act, I do not see how the Commissioners could make any regulations altering or affecting the previously existing conditions and regulations, as that would be interfering with the right of fishing. No. 101.

Duke of Fife
v. George.

It appears to me, therefore, that regulations altering or modifying the existing regulations are not, in the sense of the Act, interference with the right of fishing, but merely with the mode and manner in which such right shall be exercised.

In this case one of the conditions or regulations under which the Duke's right was exercised was that the cruives should be at least one ell in height and one ell in breadth—that is, 37 inches.

One of the general regulations issued by the Commissioners required that no cruiue shall be less than four feet broad in the clear. It appears to me that this regulation does not interfere with the Duke's right of fishing, but is merely an alteration of the conditions on which it is to be exercised, and that his Grace is bound to conform to it.

It is said, however, that if the cruives are so widened his supply of water to the Rack Mill may or will be prejudicially affected. It appears to me, however, that his right to take water is not interfered with by the regulation.

I think, therefore, that the first question should be answered in the negative.

I think the second and third questions should also be answered in the negative. I think the Duke is not bound to widen the cruives unless he pleases, and that the Fishery Board are not entitled to widen them.

The remedy is, that if the Duke proceeds to fish with cruives of a less breadth than four feet he may be stopped by interdict.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with the Lord President. We must assume that the Commissioners have a statutory power of regulation, and therefore it is not an answer or good objection to a regulation of this kind that the mode of enjoyment of the right of fishing is altered in some respects, and nothing more, I think, has been said in this case. It is substantially still a right of cruiue fishing. At the same time it is perfectly clear that the Commissioners cannot under the guise of regulations take away or substantially diminish the rights of a proprietor of salmon-fishing, and it was for the purpose of safeguarding these rights that the clause in question was inserted.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord President, and I have nothing to add, except that with reference to what Lord Adam has pointed out as to the remedy of the Fishery Board it does not appear to me that by answering the second question in the affirmative we are deciding anything contrary to Lord Adam's view as to the proper mode of enforcing the Board's right. That question is not specifically raised in this special case. The question put to us is, what are the rights and obligations of the parties, and, agreeing with your Lordships as to the obligations of the Duke of Fife, I do not see that we are called on to consider how that obligation is to be enforced since the parties have not thought fit to raise that question.

Process—Amendment of record—Expenses—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 29.—Circumstances in which the Court allowed the appellant in a Sheriff Court action to amend his defences, on condition that he should find caution for the sum of £30, to meet the expense of the prior proceedings in the case in the event of it turning out that he was in fault in not originally proposing the defence embodied in the proposed amendment.

1st Division.
Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and
Peebles.

THIS was an action for payment of £30 raised in the Debts Recovery Court at Edinburgh by James Paton, printer, Edinburgh, against John M'Knight, builder, Edinburgh.

The pursuer averred that he had let a piece of ground to the defender by holograph offer, dated 5th June 1895,* written by Mr William Ormiston, ordained surveyor, Edinburgh, to the pursuer, on behalf of the defender, and accepted by the pursuer by letter, dated 7th June;† that following upon this offer and acceptance the defender had entered into possession of the ground, and that the half year's rent due at Martinmas, amounting to £30, was unpaid.

The defender stated that Mr Ormiston had, on the pursuer's behalf, advertised the ground to be let, and that negotiations had followed between him and the defender, but he denied that Mr Ormiston had his authority to write the letter of 5th June, and that there had been any completed contract of let. He averred that Mr Ormiston was well aware that the defender wanted the ground mainly for the purpose of erecting stables thereon, and informed him that there would be no difficulty in getting warrant for their erection; that in reliance on Mr Ormiston's written assurance to this effect the defender took possession to the effect of setting down thereon a quantity of debris from a building he was dismantling; that on applying to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect the buildings he proposed, including stables, he found that the Court were strongly opposed to granting

* The alleged offer was contained in the following letter by Mr William Ormiston to the pursuer:—"On behalf of Mr John M'Knight, builder and quarrymaster, I offer to lease from you, for a period of ten years from Whitsunday of this year, that yard or piece of ground situated to the north of Lonsdale Terrace greens, and lying between the greens of Chalmers Crescent and Lauriston Gardens, at the annual rent of £60, payable half-yearly on the usual terms; the ground to be unrestricted as to the extent or character of the buildings, but no works causing nuisance to be carried on. Power also to be given to the lessee to sublet. At the termination of the lease the buildings to be removed by the lessee or purchased by you at a valuation. I will be glad to hear from you at your earliest convenience."

† Mr Paton's reply was in these terms:—"I am favoured with yours of the 5th, making offer on behalf of Mr John M'Knight of £60 per annum, for a period of ten years from Whitsunday of this year, for the ground at Lauriston Gardens, which I hereby accept on the conditions stated in your letter."

warranty, and that he therefore removed the debris he had placed on the ground, and left it in statu quo ante. No. 102.

After a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton), on 9th July 1896, found it proved that the defender agreed to lease the ground from the pursuer for the period of ten years from Whitsunday 1895, at the annual rent of £60, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday, repelled the defences, and decerned against the defender in terms of the prayer of the petition. Feb. 23, 1897.
Paton v.
M^r Knight.

The defender appealed to the First Division, and thereafter moved the Court for leave to amend his defences by adding statements thereto to the effect "that by the terms of the said pretended let to the defender of the land in question, it was an express condition that the land should be unrestricted as to the extent or character of the buildings that might be erected thereon, excepting only in so far as works causing nuisance were concerned. . . . The pursuer has never given, and now refuses to give, the defender possession of the land alleged to have been leased to him in conformity with this express stipulation." He further stated that as matter of fact, and as it appeared from objections made in the Dean of Guild Court, the ground was subject to rights of passage and various other restrictions, which rendered it impossible for the defender to make any use of it. The defender not having got possession of the ground as let, was not due any rent. The delay which had occurred in giving possession to the defender had caused him loss to an amount greatly exceeding that sued for.

The defender also craved leave to add corresponding pleas.

The defender stated at the bar that in September 1896 he had dropped his original application to the Dean of Guild Court, and presented a new petition for warrant to erect stables and an office; that he had been ordered to call the conterminous proprietors, and that they appeared and stated the objections referred to in his proposed amendment.

Argued for the defender;—The defender had taken a lease of the subjects on the express understanding that they were free from restrictions. He relied, and was entitled to rely, on the landlord's assurance to this effect, and had only become aware that the landlord was unable to fulfil his obligations in this respect when he saw the objections to his second application in the Dean of Guild Court. He was accordingly in no way to blame for omitting to state the defence he now proponed in his original defences. In these circumstances the defender should be allowed to make the alteration on his record which he proposed without any condition being imposed as to expenses, or, the question of expenses should at all events be reserved.

Argued for the pursuer;—The amendment now made at this late stage of the case completely changed the character of the defence originally stated, and should only be allowed on payment of expenses since the date of closing the record.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—It was not, I think, seriously maintained by the Paton v.

M'Knight.

Now, the case made by the appellant upon this head is this. He took the ground in question on the express condition that it was unrestricted, and he says that, receiving a responsible and authoritative statement to that effect, he was not bound to make sceptical inquiry into that statement. He has only in the course of exercising his rights as tenant found out that there are restrictions, and accordingly he maintains that he is excusable for having omitted to state as his original defence what was not within his knowledge. That may turn out to be well founded in fact, or it may not; and, according as the one or the other event happens, would seem to depend the question whether the appellant is to pay for the costs, which have, according to the hypothesis, been thrown away.

Now, we might make the appellant pay the whole costs of the case as hitherto conducted. If he then turned out to be right, he would seem to be very grievously treated by our award. On the other hand, if we were to allow him to put on his amendment on nominal terms, I must say I cannot think that would be logical. It would be either too much or too little. Under the Act of Parliament we have a free hand to determine the terms on which an amendment should be allowed, and I think in the present case the proper course is to make the appellant find caution for some sum which one would estimate as being the possible amount of the expense which will have been lost. I am not an auditor, but perhaps £30 would express that view, and I would therefore propose that this course should be taken. I am conscious that there is no precedent for this, but it is certainly within the terms of the statute, and seems the most logical way for giving it effect.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Open up the record: Allow the proposed amendment upon the appellant's finding caution for expenses to the extent of £30 to the satisfaction of the Clerk of Court: Upon such caution being found and amendment made, allow the respondent to lodge answers to such amendment."

Reparation—Breach of Contract—Taking decree in absence—Damages—Consequential damages—Publication in "Black List."—In an action of damages against a defender for taking decree in absence in the Debts Recovery Court against the pursuer, in breach of an agreement not to do so, held that in assessing the damages the jury were entitled to take into account damage resulting from the publication of the decree in a "Black List," that being proved to be the natural and invariable consequence of a decree in absence being taken in the Debts Recovery Court.

Davies & Co. v. Brown & Lyell, June 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 842, commented on.

The pursuers averred that the defenders, having raised a Debts Recovery action against the pursuers for £43, being the amount of an account for goods supplied by them to the pursuers, had agreed to stop proceedings in consideration of an immediate payment of £25 by the pursuers, and to give the pursuers a reasonable time to pay the balance, but that in breach of this agreement the defenders, although they duly received the sum of £25, had culpably and negligently taken decree in absence against the pursuers for the balance of their account, which decree was published in the "Black List," and that the pursuers had sustained serious loss through the defenders' illegal act. Feb. 23, 1897.
Gibson & Co.
v. Anderson &
Co.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury on 11th January 1897, upon the issue whether "the defenders wrongously, and in breach of their agreement with the pursuers not to do so, took decree in absence against the pursuers in the Debts Recovery Court, at Edinburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers." At the trial the defenders objected to the pursuers leading evidence of damage resulting from the publication of the decree in the "Black List" in the Scottish Gazette, and similar papers. The objection was repelled, and evidence was led shewing that damage had resulted from persons hearing of such publication. Two witnesses had seen the entry in the Scottish Gazette. Richard Clark, wholesale druggist, deponed that he had seen the entry of the decree in the Scottish Gazette, and that though he had continued to supply goods to the pursuer on the same terms as before he had exercised a stricter supervision. James H. Robertson gave similar evidence.

In the course of the proof Mr Kerr, Sheriff-clerk-depute in the Small-Debt and Debts Recovery Department, Edinburgh, gave evidence to the effect that decrees in absence in the Debts Recovery Court were invariably published in the "Black List," as a matter of course, and Mr Anderson, a partner of the defenders' firm, admitted that such publication was the "natural result" of a decree in absence.

In charging the jury the Lord President asked them to separate the damage which could be traced to the publication of the decree in absence in certain newspapers from the damage that could not be so traced.

The jury found for the pursuers and assessed the damage at £300, "and they further state that it makes no difference in their finding whether the evidence of the witnesses Richard Clark and James H. Robertson is taken into consideration or not."

The defenders applied for a rule on the ground of excess of damage. The rule was granted.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The jury were quite entitled to take into account damage resulting from the publication in the "Black List," such publication being the natural and invariable result of the decree being taken. The opinions expressed in *Davies v. Brown*¹ were obiter dicta, and were also expressed in ignorance of the relation that existed between the taking a decree in absence, and its publication in the "Black List." They could not be taken as authoritative on the present case. (2) The award was reasonable, and should not be disturbed.

No. 103. Argued for the defenders;—The award was excessive. The jury had taken into account damage resulting from publication in the "Black List." This they were not entitled to do.¹ The pursuers could only recover for such damage as they proved to have resulted directly from the taking of the decree. But most of the instances in which it was proved that the pursuers had suffered loss from injury to their credit appeared to have been the result of the publication of the decree in the "Black List."

Feb. 23, 1897.
Gibson & Co.
v. Anderson &
Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The ground of action in this case is, that whereas it had been agreed with the pursuers that the defenders should not proceed and take a decree in an action in the Debts Recovery Court in Edinburgh, yet, in breach of that agreement, they went on and took a decree out, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers.

Now, two questions have been argued to us. The first is as to whether, in support of a case of damages on this head, the pursuers were not limited to the injury arising from the persons present in Court, or inspecting the records of the Sheriff Court, learning of the decree having been taken. I put the question in that form because I think that that is really the logical extent to which Mr Jameson's argument carries him. He has maintained, on the authority of the case of Davies,¹ that a person taking a decree in breach of an agreement is not liable for the larger amount of damage which may ensue because, through the publication of certain lists of decrees in absence, a larger public is reached than that which frequents the Sheriff Court or inspects the records of the Sheriff Court. Now, I shall consider this question, first of all, apart from the case of *Davies*¹ altogether. I suppose it is sound doctrine that when a man is sued for breach of an agreement he is liable in the natural and ordinary consequences of that breach; and accordingly the question would naturally occur, if a decree is taken in the Debts Recovery Court, what is the ordinary and natural consequence so far as regards the degree of publicity which the fact obtains. Now, it was thought at the trial by the pursuer—and I think quite properly—that it was well that he should lay a foundation of fact on this question, and he asked the Sheriff-clerk-depute, as the functionary who had knowledge of the degree of publicity obtained by such decrees, and Mr Kerr says,—“Decrees in absence of the Debts Recovery Court are invariably published. That follows as a matter of course.” And Mr Anderson, of the defenders' firm, says, very frankly,—“I am aware that it is the custom to publish decrees in absence in such papers as the Scottish Gazette. If decree in absence were taken against a trader, publication in these papers would be the natural result.” It could not, I suppose, be more frankly or pointedly put than it is in these words; and, as Mr Young pointed out, when Mr Anderson was narrating, in cross-examination, his reasons for the agreement, he avows that Mr Gordon, who represented the pursuer, expressed anxiety to have the matter taken out of Court, “I suppose in order to avoid publicity.” Accordingly, in this case it would appear, whatever the law may be, that as matter of fact the foreseen and natural consequence of a decree being taken is that that reaches the know- No. 103.

 ledge of the commercial class who are concerned with such information Feb. 23, 1897.
 through the medium of certain newspapers—commercial newspapers. I do Gibson & Co.
 not say that the matter would be a bit different if some of the ordinary v. Anderson & newspapers had found it profitable to have a column containing information Co. of this kind. The question simply is, what is the custom—what is the natural consequence of a decree of this sort being taken. I suppose it would be a matter of evidence whether many or few people frequented the Sheriff Court and inspected the roll, and whether many or few people have access through this other channel to the news in which they take an interest.

Now, I leave to others to comment on the decision which is supposed, doubtless erroneously, to tend to exclude what apart from authority would seem prima facie to be very good evidence. It is scarcely to be supposed that if the question had been presented to the Court on proved facts such as I have adverted to, the Court would have rejected evidence which clearly shewed that the degree of publicity actually obtained was the natural and foreseen consequence of a breach of agreement such as this. I may mention merely by way of explanation of what took place at the trial, that, feeling there was apparent plausibility in the argument of the defenders founded on that case, I thought it well that the jury should separate the damage which they considered to arise from the knowledge of this fact of the decree in absence having reached certain persons through these newspapers from the general evidence where there is no such tracing of the information to that particular class of newspapers; but it turned out that the jury did not think—there were only two gentlemen whose names were suggested—that the figure of the damages would be altered supposing these gentlemen had never heard of the decree at all.

Now, I pass from that special question to the more general question argued by Mr Jameson, that the verdict for £300 is unconscionable or exorbitant and excessive.—[His Lordship then referred to the evidence on the question of damages.] I have specified these things, not by way of furnishing an exhaustive collection that will work out £300, for I confess my sum would have been a somewhat smaller one; but your Lordships, I understand, in practice do not set aside a verdict merely because you think, or because the presiding Judge thinks, that £200 might have been more like it than £300, and I must, speaking as I am bound to do, frankly, say that I think a verdict for £200 would have been completely unassailable.
 Accordingly, I daresay I have fulfilled my part in the expression of opinion
 I have now indicated, that while I think the award is a liberal one, I do not think it so excessive a measure of damage as to entitle the Court to interfere.

LORD ADAM.—The only ground on which the verdict is assailed is that the amount of damage given is excessive, and it is said to be excessive, as I understand the argument for the defenders, principally because the jury have taken into consideration what they were not entitled to consider—the damages suffered from the fact of this decree in absence having come to the ears of certain people through a newspaper called the Scottish Gazette. It is contended that the only damage which the pursuer is entitled to recover is, as Mr Jameson put it when he first opened his case, damage resulting Gibson & Co.

v. Anderson &
Co.

from the knowledge having come to the ears of people from other sources than the Scottish Gazette. This paper seems to be one of those papers that are not uncommon now-a-days—Stubbs' Gazette being perhaps the best known paper of the kind—which are the chosen home of what is called the “Black List,” that being a list where a record is published of all parties who, like the pursuer in this case, have had decrees in absence taken out against them in the Court. Now, I did not gather from Mr Jameson that he could draw a distinction between publication in a paper of that description and the publication of the same thing in any other paper which is the vehicle of ordinary news. I think when Mr Jameson was pressed in the course of the argument to say whether publication in a paper containing a Black List as its principal information differed from publication in an ordinary newspaper, he could not say that it did. Therefore, as your Lordship has pointed out, he was driven in the end to maintain that no damage could be awarded except what was traceable to persons who had been in Court or had examined the records of the Court. The question, as it appears to me, is whether we are to follow the well-known doctrine applicable to cases of this kind, that the damage to be awarded is the damage naturally flowing from the breach of contract. If we follow that rule, the evidence here shews quite clearly and distinctly that the damages arising from the publication in the Gazette is just that which naturally—not only probably, but we may say certainly—would flow from such a decree being taken, because it is proved in this case—and it would have been assumed without proof—that one of the natural results flowing from such a decree being taken is, that it is immediately published in papers such as the Scottish Gazette. I think therefore that the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived, unless the case is to be treated as thoroughly exceptional, is the right one.

In support of his argument, the defender founded upon certain observations made by the Judges in the case of Davies.¹ Now, in the first place, I am not of opinion that these observations apply to this case. That was an action, as I understand it, for damages for malicious use of the forms of Court. The ground of action was that the defender, after he had been paid what was due him, had gone on and taken decree against the pursuer, and the issue was, whether that proceeding was malicious and without probable cause, which is quite a different issue from what we have here. It certainly was not a case, as put in the issue, of breach of contract. In the next place, as I understood what was read to me, the stage at which these observations were made by the Judges was when they were adjusting the issues to try the cause, and it does not appear to me that the question of what was relevant or was not relevant to the amount of damages came properly before them for consideration.

On the second point your Lordship, who tried the case, is of opinion that, supposing the jury had given the sum of £200, that would not have been unreasonable. In such a case I do not think the Court—even if they would have given £200 instead of £300—would hold the award to be such as twelve reasonable men could not have given, and to be so excessive as to justify the setting aside of the verdict. I therefore concur with your Lordship.

tively infrequent, where the damage is ascertained by exact calculation. Co.
Experience proves that good judges, meaning to be perfectly fair, differ very considerably in the value they put upon a thing that depends upon estimation, and therefore, unless jury trial is to lose all finality, we must allow a considerable margin for difference of opinion, and I agree with your Lordship that while we might be content to put a lesser value upon the damage done to this gentleman's commercial reputation—which I am glad to see has not been great—yet the difference between £200 and £300 is not such a difference as would justify us in setting aside the verdict on the ground of excessive damages. It is no more than the difference that honest and skilled valuers of property might reasonably put on the same subject.

The chief interest in this case seems to me to depend on the question which was raised as to the value to be attached to the indirect evidence in the case; that is to say, to the evidence of people in whose estimation the pursuer is said to have suffered, because they had read his name in a publication of decrees in absence. Now, from the outset, it seemed to me impossible to take any clear distinction between the evidence admissible in a case of this kind and in the case of an ordinary action for defamation or injury to reputation. Supposing the statement had been that the defender in presence of certain persons in the trade, possibly at an exchange or place of resort in the trade, had said,—“I know that the pursuer is not able to meet a bill of £43,” in such a case the injury complained of is not the opinion merely of the persons to whom the statement is directly made, but in such cases a wave of opinion is set up, and in a very short time spreads through the whole class of persons with whom the aggrieved person is associated in business. It has never been doubted that it is a good case of damages to prove that a calumnious statement had been circulated and had reached persons whose good opinion was valuable to the pursuer, and whose opinion was affected by it. Nor does it make the slightest difference in such a case whether the wave of calumny is propagated by word of mouth, or through the medium of newspapers, as in cases where the calumnies are uttered at public meetings or under such circumstances that they enter the press as items of news. But now, if instead of stating circumstantially that the pursuer is unable to meet a claim of £43, the defender puts it to the test of taking a decree in absence against the pursuer, and thereby gives the information the widest publicity, does it make any difference? Of course, if it were a just decree, no responsibility is incurred,—every creditor is entitled to enforce his claim of debt, and no claim lies against him because of the injury which the debtor thereby sustains in his commercial reputation. But if, contrary to an agreement, the creditor takes a decree by an abuse of the forms of process, I cannot see that he is in a different position from a person who ultroneously makes the same statement which everyone would make on reading the decree, namely, that the debtor is unable to pay a claim of that amount. Therefore, it appears to me that the presiding Judge rightly admitted the evidence of witnesses who had derived their knowledge of the decree through the news-

No. 103. papers or through the publication called the Scottish Gazette, which contains this so-called black list. In saying so I do not mean to imply that if any greater harm is done by the insertion of the pursuer's name in a list along with other debtors than would result from its isolated publication, the defenders ought to be responsible for that. I think he should be responsible just in the same way as if in the law reports of the newspaper, in addition to the defended cases, it had been said,—“Decree in absence was obtained against Gibson & Company on this day.” But one can see that there are cases where the association of a name along with other names may constitute an aggravation of the injury or a separate ground of injury. It might not be very injurious to reputation, for example, that a person had not been admitted into a particular club, but if somebody published a list of persons who had been black-balled by this club, or, say, who had been refused admission to a racecourse, and the unfortunate complainer found his name associated with “blacklegs” on the turf, he might suffer injury to character and feelings of a very different character from that resulting from the mere publication of the fact that he himself, for some reason or other, had been refused admission to this social function. Now, if in the case of *Davies*¹ the observations made by the Lord President and Lord Curriehill had reference to a claim of damage of the kind I have indicated, I should entirely agree. If they meant anything more than that—if it was meant that publication in the Black List could not be used as evidence of injury to character, I should venture respectfully to differ; and I think we are free to consider this point independently of authority, because the observations founded on were observations thrown out in the course of a discussion of the relevancy, and in no way binding the Court to exclude evidence of the description we are now considering when the question is formally raised on a motion for a new trial. Strictly speaking, I am not sure that we could, in the absence of a formal exception to the Judge's ruling, reject the evidence or displace the verdict on this ground, but this is immaterial in my opinion, for I am satisfied that the evidence was rightly admitted. I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships. I think that if any question as to the admissibility of evidence were formally before us, no evidence was allowed to go to the jury that was not properly receivable. The wrong of which the pursuer complains arises from the publicity of proceedings which he says were wrongly taken against him. That is the sole ground of complaint. It is because they were made public, and so injured his credit among the tradesmen with whom he dealt, or his customers, that he has any claim for damage. It is the natural and ordinary, and, indeed, it appears to be the inevitable consequence of taking decree in absence in the Debts Recovery Court that the proceedings are at once made public by a variety of newspapers, including those papers which publish separate black lists. If that be the ordinary and necessary consequence of the defenders' breach of contract in taking decree, then I agree with all your Lordships that it is a consequence of which evidence is admissible. Therefore I think the learned Judge was perfectly right in allowing this evidence to go to the jury.

The only difficulty that has occurred to me in the case has been created by the citation of Davies v. Brown.¹ But in the first place, I agree with what has been already said about that case, that the observations relied upon were not necessary to the judgment, but were observations by the way, and therefore are not binding upon us. But then I should myself have very great reluctance in coming to any decision directly contrary to an opinion expressed by so high authorities as the learned Judges whose observations are quoted in Davies v. Brown.¹ But I am not at all persuaded that the Lord President and Lord Curriehill were really considering the question which we are called upon to determine now, or that they intended to say anything at all about the admissibility of evidence. In that case there was a very specific, detailed, and somewhat elaborate statement in the condescendence of publication in certain newspapers; and the observations of the learned Judges were all made with reference to that statement only. They knew nothing more of the case than what they saw in the condescendence, and it was as a criticism of the condescendence that they made the observations in question. Now, it is not the function of the condescendence to set out in detail the evidence on which the pursuer means to rely. Its proper purpose is to aver the facts upon which his claim is grounded, or, in a case of this kind, the facts which constitute the wrong of which he complains. And therefore it appears to me the Court may very well in that case have looked on this averment as an averment of a separate wrong, which the pursuer was bringing forward as a ground of claim. I do not think that if that were so there is anything to create any surprise or doubt as to the opinions expressed that that was not a relevant ground of action, for it merely came to this, that it might not be a direct or natural consequence of what the defender had done that this other wrong set forth in the specific averment was committed. But I cannot read these opinions as amounting to a judgment that it is not relevant to prove injuries to the trade or credit of a person making a complaint of this kind by reason of its having come to the knowledge of persons trading with him, not because of their having been in Court and learned the proceedings by their own ears, but because they had read it in the newspapers. That is what the defenders maintain here. I do not think that it is supported by the judgment in Davies v. Brown.¹ But if it were, then I should agree with your Lordships that we are not bound to follow it, and ought not to do so.

As to the other matter, I entirely agree with all your Lordships that it is a question for the jury to determine what is the proper amount of damage, and as your Lordship has said, it is a question of difficulty and of considerable delicacy. Whatever our own opinion is, we ought not to interfere with a verdict of a jury, unless it is quite evident that they have given not what we may think too much, but what is so excessive and exorbitant as to make it unreasonable that their verdict should stand. I do not think that is the case here, and therefore I concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

No. 104. THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Complainers (Reclaimers).—

 North British
 Railway Co. v.
 Lanarkshire
 and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

THE LANARKSHIRE AND DUMBERTONSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Dickson—Malcolm.

Process—Arbitration—Res Judicata—Plea of competent and omitted—

By Act of Parliament passed in 1891 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company were empowered to construct a line of railway from Glasgow to Dumbarton. Section 6, subsection 4, enacted that the railway should "be carried under the joint sidings and works of the North British Company and the Caledonian Company at Stobcross in tunnel, and the company shall not, without the previous consent of the companies owning the same, in the construction of such tunnel, break open the surface of the ground, or in any way raise or interfere with the rails of the North British Company or of the joint property of that company and the Caledonian Company."

The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company brought an action against the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed within the North British and Caledonian Companies' depot at Stobcross, averring that they had not obtained the consent of the North British Company to its erection. The Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company having denied this averment, the cause was remitted for decision to an arbiter as required by the special Act of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company. The decision of the arbiter was to the effect "that the construction of the shaft fell under the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the special Act, and required the consent of the North British and Caledonian Companies, and that the consent of the North British Company had not been obtained." The Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company having thereafter served a notice to treat on the North British Company, intimating that they intended to take the ground upon which the shaft was constructed under their compulsory powers, the North British Company applied for interdict against them in any way following up the notice. In defence to this action the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company stated that the limitation on their power to acquire ground compulsorily imposed by section 6, subsection 4, of their Act applied solely to the joint sidings and works of the North British and Caledonian Companies, and that the ground proposed to be taken, though within the depot, was not part of their joint sidings and works. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy, diss. the Lord President) that this defence, not being open to the respondents prior to the service of the notice to treat, could not have been dealt with by or pleaded before the arbiter, and therefore that it was open to the respondents still to maintain it.

1ST DIVISION. (SEQUEL of case reported 23 R. 76.)

Ld. Kyllachy.

In 1891 the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company were empowered by Act of Parliament (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cci.), to construct a line of railway from Glasgow to Dumbarton. The line near its commencement at Glasgow passed in tunnel under the Stobcross Station or depot, which belonged jointly to the North British and Caledonian Railway Companies, and in constructing this tunnel the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company constructed a ventilating shaft on ground situated within the Stobcross depot.

In 1895 the North British Company raised an action against the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Company concluding for decree ordaining them to close up this ventilating shaft, and to restore the surface of the ground to its former state.

The pursuers averred that the ground pierced by the shaft was a part of the Stobcross depot which was wholly dedicated to the use of the North British Railway Company, and that the defenders had not obtained the consent of the pursuers to its construction, as required by section 6, subsection 4,* of the Act authorising the construction of the defenders' undertaking.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Rail-
way Co.

The defenders admitted that the shaft was situated within the depot, but averred that they had obtained the consent of the pursuers to its erection. They further stated:—(Stat. 4) “ . . . The shaft does not in any way interfere with the working of the traffic in the depot. The ground in which it is placed is waste or vacant ground, and is not used for any purpose in connection with the depot.”

The defenders also pleaded that the action was excluded by section 6, subsection 10, of the defenders' Act, which provided a scheme of arbitration for the settlement of differences between the companies.

On 5th November 1895 the First Division, adhering to an interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy, found “that the question between the parties falls to be determined by an arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade,” and Major-General Hutchinson having subsequently been appointed arbiter by the Board of Trade, the Lord Ordinary remitted to him “to determine the question between the parties raised upon record.”

On 6th February 1896 Major-General Hutchinson reported to the following effect:—“ . . . I have to report that after having carefully inspected the ground in which the shaft in dispute is constructed, and having heard evidence adduced by both parties, and considered the same along with the relative plans and documents produced, I am of opinion that the construction of the said shaft falls under the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, and required therefore the consent both of the North British and the Caledonian Railway Companies. I am further of the opinion that the consent of the North British Railway Company was not duly obtained thereto. The plan which was submitted to the North British Railway Company's engineer on 24th May 1892 did not sufficiently disclose the existence of the shaft in question. That in effect is an enclosure containing an area of about 644 square feet on ground belonging jointly to the Caledonian and North British Companies, and within a few feet of the rails of the City and Suburban line of the North British Railway Company, the doubling of which at any future period would thereby be seriously interfered with, and there is nothing on the plan which can reasonably be held as directing attention to so serious an operation. Before proceeding with the construction of such a shaft, a proper working plan, shewing distinctly what was proposed to be done, should have been submitted, and the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company having

* That subsection enacted,—“(4) Railway No. 1 shall be carried under the North British Company's Glasgow City and District Railway, and under the joint sidings and works of that company and the Caledonian Company at Stobcross in tunnel, and the company shall not, without the previous consent of the companies owning the same, in the construction of such tunnel, break open the surface of the ground, or in any way raise or interfere with the rails of the North British Company, or of the joint property of that company and the Caledonian Company, but the company may open the surface, where necessary, for the purpose of temporarily supporting or protecting the railways or sidings of those companies from injury during the construction of the railway.”

North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

On 19th February the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company served upon the North British Railway Company a notice to treat, to the effect that they proposed to take under their compulsory powers certain ground, being that occupied by the ventilating shaft.

The North British Railway Company thereupon presented the present note of suspension and interdict to have the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company interdicted from in any way following up the above notice to treat.

The complainers founded on the proceedings in the previous case and the award of the arbiter. They averred that the ground which the respondents proposed to take was part of the joint sidings and works at Stobcross belonging to themselves and the Caledonian Railway Company, that the respondents were prohibited by section 6, subsection 4, of their Act from taking that ground compulsorily, and further, that their attempt to do so was an attempt to get behind General Hutchinson's award.

They further averred;—(Stat. 8) "The contention of the respondents that the ground occupied by the ventilating shaft was not part of the joint sidings and works of the complainers and the Caledonian Railway Company at Stobcross, within the meaning of subsection 4 of section 6 of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, was urged by the respondents before Major-General Hutchinson, and rejected by him."

The respondents answered that they were entitled to take the ground referred to in the notice to treat. "Said ground is part of that which the respondents are empowered by their said Act to acquire compulsorily within the Stobcross depot. The only limitation on the power of the respondents to acquire ground compulsorily within the Stobcross depot is that provided by section 6, subsection 4, which applies exclusively to the joint works and sidings, and the ground now proposed to be taken under said notice to treat is not included in such limitation."

The complainers pleaded;—(4) The engineer appointed by the Board of Trade having disallowed the shaft in question, notwithstanding the plea urged by the respondents before him, and repeated in this action, that said shaft is not situated on the joint sidings and works of the complainers and the Caledonian Railway Company at Stobcross, and his decision being final, interdict should be granted as craved.

The respondents pleaded;—(4) In respect that the operations of the respondents do not affect the complainers' Glasgow City and District Railway, or the joint sidings and works of the complainers and the Caledonian Railway Company at Stobcross, the complainers are not entitled to interdict.

On 15th July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the fourth plea in law for the complainers, found that the question between the parties fell to be determined by an arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade, in terms of section 6, subsection 10, of the respondents' Act, and therefore sisted process to enable application to be made to the Board of Trade for the appointment of an arbiter.*

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—The respondents had in the former action averred that the ground upon which the shaft was constructed was not part of the works at Stobcross depot, and the terms of the award shewed that the question had been raised and considered by the arbiter. The decision of the arbiter was therefore res judicata and final. If the point had not been raised before the arbiter, it was a competent plea which had been omitted, and therefore could not be proponed now. No. 104.

Argued for the respondents;—The point now raised was not open to the respondents prior to the notice to treat, and therefore was not and could not have been raised in the proceedings in the previous case. The record of these proceedings shewed that both the parties and the arbiter had proceeded on the assumption that the site of the shaft was within the area to which the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the special Act applied. The pleas of res judicata and competent and omitted were therefore not well founded. In any case, the questions raised in the former action not having been finally disposed of, but merely sisted for decision by the arbiter, the proper pany, of a large area of ground known as the Stobcross Station or depot near to the Queen's Dock at Glasgow. The respondents are the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company, incorporated by the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, and by that Act authorised to construct a line of railway from Glasgow to Dumbarton. The respondents have lately given notice, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, incorporated with their special Act, to purchase and take for the purposes of their line a certain part of the ground of which the complainers are joint owners. And the object of the action is to obtain interdict against the respondents following up or proceeding under that notice.

"The complainers' objection is that the ground in question is part of their and the Caledonian Railway Company's joint sidings and works, and that under the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the respondents' special Act, the latter are prohibited from taking compulsorily any land occupied by the joint sidings and works of the two companies. By the section in question it is directed that under those joint sidings and works the respondents' line shall be constructed in tunnel, and that without the consent of the joint owners the surface of the ground shall not be broken. The complainers say, and it is not disputed, that the object of the respondents' notice is to acquire full rights over the surface of the ground to which the notice applies.

"The answer of the respondents is that the ground in question does not in fact form part of the joint sidings and works of the two companies, and that therefore section 6 of the special Act does not apply.

"The complainers reply, inter alia, that it is res judicata in a former action between the parties that the ground in question is within the area of the joint sidings and works. They say (1) that the contrary allegation was a defence proponed and repelled in the former action, and (2) that if not proponed and repelled it was a defence competent and omitted.

"Now, the conclusion of the former action was for removal of a certain ventilating shaft constructed by the respondents and projecting above the surface within the area now in dispute. And I shall assume, in the meantime, that the complainers have obtained, or are entitled to obtain, decree in the former action. In other words, that that action is now in such a position that no new or further defence can now be stated by way of amendment.

"But so assuming, I am, in the first place, not able to hold that the question, whether or not the ground in dispute is within the sidings and works of the complainers was a question raised and determined in the

No. 104. plea would not be either res judicata or competent and omitted, but lis alibi pendens.

Feb. 23, 1897.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The complainers, the North British Railway Company, are joint owners with the Caledonian Railway Company of a large area of ground known as the Stobcross Station or depot. The respondents are the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company, and are authorised to construct a railway from Glasgow to Dumbarton.

On the 19th February 1896 the respondents served upon the complainers a notice to treat for the purchase of a portion of that area of ground, and the present suspension is brought for the purpose of interdicting the respondents from taking any further proceedings under that notice to treat.

The question at issue between the parties arises in this way. The Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, under which the respondents claim to have right to purchase the land embraced in the notice, contains a former action. The demand in that action was, as I have said, that the respondents should remove a certain ventilating shaft, and the only defence stated to that demand was that the shaft in question had been constructed with the consent of the two companies. No other defence was stated, or, as I shall point out presently, could have been stated as matters then stood. At anyrate no other defence was stated, and the issue being simply consent or no consent (an issue depending on the construction of certain plans and correspondence), the same was remitted under an arbitration clause in the special Act to Major-General Hutchinson, who some time ago reported negating the alleged consent. His report is produced. I need not recite its terms, but its substance was to negative the alleged consent. He may have expressed opinions on other points, but the point mentioned was the only point remitted to him, and the only point which he did or could decide. I cannot therefore hold that the defence in question was in the former action proposed and repelled.

“That, however, leaves it quite open to argue that the point now raised, viz., the point whether the ground in question is within the joint sidings and works, so as to make the consent of the two companies requisite, was a defence competent and omitted. Here again I am unable to accept the complainers’ argument. The defence was certainly omitted, but, as matters stood at the time, I do not at present see how it was competent. In other words, I fail to see, that if stated, it would have been a good defence. The respondents had neither acquired the surface, nor had they then taken any proceedings towards acquiring it. Whether, therefore, it was within the restricted area, or, as they now say, beyond it, they had no right to interfere with the surface without the consent of the complainers. They believed they had such consent, and so believing, thought it, I suppose, unnecessary to raise any question as to the precise limits of the restricted area. As their rights then stood, they had no title or interest to do so. In these circumstances, if the ground in question be in fact outside the restricted area, and if under their present notice the respondents acquire it in property, I do not see how the proceedings in the former action can form an obstacle to the exercise of the new rights which they (the respondents) thus acquire.

“That being so, it is unnecessary to consider whether it is still open to amend the record in the former action so as to introduce a new defence founded upon the averment that the ventilating shaft is outside the joint sidings and works, and that the ground which it occupies is in course of being acquired by the respondents under their notice to treat.

“I am not, I confess, as at present advised, prepared to hold such an clause (section 6, subsection 4), to the effect that railway No. 1, thereby authorised, should be carried under the North British Company's Glasgow City and District Railway, and under the joint sidings and works of that company and the Caledonian Railway Company at Stobcross, in tunnel, and that the company should not, without the previous consent of the companies owning the same, in the construction of such tunnel, break open the surface of the ground, or in any way raise or interfere with the rails of the North British Company, or of the joint property of that company and the Caledonian Railway Company, but that the company might open the surface, where necessary, for the purpose of temporarily supporting or protecting the railways and sidings of these companies from injury during the construction of the railway.

No. 104.
Feb. 23, 1897.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Rail-
way Co.

The complainers maintain that the land embraced in the notice to treat is land occupied by the joint sidings and works of the North British and Caledonian Railways. The respondents deny that this is so. I understand that if the land is occupied as the complainers say that it is, the respondents do not maintain that they have a right to acquire it compulsorily. On the other hand I understand that if the land is not so occupied, the complainers do not dispute the respondents' right to acquire it.

The question at issue between the parties is therefore one of fact—whether the land proposed to be taken forms part of the joint sidings and works of the North British and Caledonian Railway Companies in the sense of the 4th subsection of the 6th section of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891.

The complainers maintain that this fact has already been conclusively determined in their favour in a previous action between the parties—the proceedings in which I shall presently have to consider—but assuming for the present that the complainers are wrong in this, the question arises as to the farther proceedings in this case.

Now, subsection 10 of section 6 of the respondents' Act enacts, that if amendment incompetent. No decree has been pronounced in the former action, nor has anything been done under it since the date of General Hutchinson's report. It would therefore, I think, be difficult to hold the introduction of a new and emerging defence to be outside the Court of Session Act of 1868. As I have said, however, I do not think it necessary to deal further with the former action at the present stage. It may, I think, conveniently stand over until the present case is finally decided.

"It remains, however, to consider by what procedure the facts at issue between the parties, with respect to the locality of the ground embraced in the respondents' notice, shall be determined. The respondents ask a proof. The complainers ask that the question shall be remitted to General Hutchinson under the arbitration clause, which is subsection 10 of section 6 of the special Act. On this matter I am of opinion with the complainers, and generally for the reasons expressed in my former judgment. I propose, therefore, to pronounce an interlocutor repelling the fourth plea in law for the complainers, finding that the question between the parties falls to be determined by an arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade in terms of section 6, subsection 10, of the respondents' Act, and therefore sisting process to enable either of the parties to make application to the Board of Trade for the appointment of an arbiter, with a view to the cause being remitted to such arbiter upon his appointment. I shall meantime reserve all questions of expenses."

No. 104. any difference should at any time arise between the company and the North British Company or their respective engineers with respect to any of the matters above referred to in the section, such difference should be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade on the application of either company.

Feb. 23, 1897.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Rail-
way Co.

I think that the difference which has arisen between the parties, viz., whether the ground proposed to be taken is occupied by the joint sidings and works of the railway companies, or, in other words, whether the respondents' railway is being carried in tunnel under these sidings and works, as required by subsection 4 of section 6, is a difference to which the arbitration clause, contained in subsection 10, applies.

If, therefore, the Lord Ordinary is right in repelling the complainers' 4th plea in law, which I shall now consider, I agree with him that this case should be sisted to enable either party to apply to the Board of Trade for the appointment of an arbiter.

The complainers' 4th plea is to the effect that in certain previous proceedings between the parties the question now at issue between them was determined in their favour by an arbiter appointed under subsection 10, and that his determination is final.

It appears that the respondents had constructed a ventilating shaft through the surface of the depot into their tunnel beneath. In February 1895 the complainers raised an action against them to have this ventilating shaft removed. It is not disputed that this shaft is upon the ground sought to be compulsorily acquired by the respondents.

In that action the complainers quoted section 6, subsection 4, of the respondents' Act, and they averred that the shaft was not authorised by their Act of Parliament, and had been placed on the ground in direct violation of the provisions of that Act.

In defence the respondents did not deny that the shaft fell within the provisions of subsection 4 of section 6, but they averred that the shaft was constructed with the consent, express or implied, of the complainers; and they farther pleaded that the question should be referred to arbitration in terms of subsection 10 of that section. The Lord Ordinary sustained that plea by interlocutor of 11th July 1895, which was subsequently adhered to by the Court. He subsequently remitted the case to General Hutchinson (who had been named as arbiter by the Board of Trade), "to determine the question between the parties raised upon record, and to report his determination quam primum."

On the 6th February 1896 General Hutchinson issued a report, in which he states that he is of opinion that the construction of the said shaft falls under the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the Act, and therefore required the consent of the complainers and the Caledonian Railway Company, and that the consent of the complainers had not been duly obtained thereto, and then he states his reasons for coming to that conclusion.

It is, as I understand, upon that opinion or determination of the arbiter, viz., that the construction of the shaft falls under the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of the Act, that the complainers maintain that the present question has been finally determined in their favour, because if the construction of the shaft falls under that subsection, it is because it is upon ground occupied by the joint sidings and works of the railway companies, No. 104. which they say is the question at issue in the present case.

But, as I have already pointed out, this question was not raised in the former case. It was assumed,—nay pleaded,—by both parties that subsection 4 did apply to the case. The only question at issue was whether the respondents had obtained the consent of the railway companies to the construction of the shaft, and that was the only question remitted to the arbiter to determine, and the only question as to which his determination is final.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Rail-
way Co.

There may, however, be grounds upon which the respondents may not be able to get behind this alleged determination of the arbiter, and accordingly the complainers maintain that the plea now insisted in by the respondents, viz., that the shaft is not within the area of ground embraced by subsection 4, was a plea which was competent and omitted, and cannot now be insisted in.

It will be observed, however, that whether the shaft was within the area embraced by subsection 4 or not, it was certainly within the area of the Stobcross depot, which was the property of the railway companies. If the respondents had the requisite consent to its construction, it was entirely immaterial whether it was within the larger or the more limited area, and equally so if they had not the requisite consent. I do not see, therefore, that it was a plea which they could have competently or effectually pleaded in the former action as matters then stood. But the situation of matters is now changed by the subsequent proceedings of the respondents. They have given notice to treat for the purchase of the ground on which the shaft is situated. That raises the question whether that ground is within the area of ground embraced in subsection 4. I think it is a question raised for the first time, and which, for the reasons I have stated, I think has never been determined. I think the respondents are entitled to have that question tried; and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it should be determined in this action. If the respondents are right, they will be entitled to maintain the shaft on what will, in that case, be their own ground. If they are wrong, the shaft will then be removed under the former action.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. The purpose of this action is to interdict the respondents from following up or proceeding under a notice which they have given, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts, to take for the purposes of their line a piece of ground of which the complainers are joint owners. The complainers object that the ground in question forms part of the joint sidings and works of their company and the Caledonian Railway Company, which the respondents are prohibited from taking compulsorily by the provisions of section 6, subsection 4, of their special Act. The respondents answer that the ground in question does not in fact form part of the joint sidings and works of the complainers and the Caledonian Railway Company, and that it is part of the lands which the respondents are empowered by their Act to acquire compulsorily. The main question, therefore, between the parties is, whether the ground in question is or is not in point of fact a part of the joint sidings and works

No. 104. of the North British and Caledonian Railway Companies? I think that this question has not been determined by the judgment of the arbiter in the former action, and therefore that there is nothing in his decision to exclude inquiry in the present process.

North British
Railway Co. v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Rail-
way Co.

I agree that the decision of General Hutchinson assumes that the ground is within the protected area, but the question which he had to decide was submitted to him upon that assumption. He was not called upon to apply his mind judicially to the question of fact, because for the purposes of the arbitration it was assumed on both sides that no such question arose. The case maintained by the respondents was not that the ground in question was beyond the area of the joint sidings and works, but that the ventilating shaft to which the complainers objected had been constructed with their own consent. Now, I take it to be clear that in order to support a plea of res judicata it is necessary to shew not only that the parties and the subject-matter in two suits are identical, but also that the two suits present one and the same ground of claim, so that the specific point raised in the second has been as directly raised in the pleadings and concluded by the judgment in the first. Now, we do not know what evidence was in fact led before the arbiter, but we must look to the pleadings in the former action in order to see what the question was that was submitted to him, and it seems to me clear enough that the question whether the ground in dispute could have been acquired by the exercise of compulsory powers was neither raised upon the pleadings nor apposite to the case. On the other hand, the evidence of consent which may have been adduced in the former case would in no way support the case now made by the respondents. I think, therefore, that there has been no decision of the question raised by the present record.

If this be so, the next question is whether the plea which the respondents now put forward was competent and omitted in the former suit, and as to this I agree with the Lord Ordinary. It would not have been consistent with the respondents' case in the former action to maintain that the ground which they proposed to occupy by their shaft was land which they might acquire in the exercise of their compulsory powers, because they had not acquired the land, and had given no notice to treat. Their case was that they were entitled to use the ground for the construction of their tunnel without taking it under the statutes, because the complainers had consented to their doing so. That being decided against them, it appears to me that they raise an entirely different question when they claim right to acquire the ground in the exercise of their statutory powers.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The purpose for which the respondents propose to take the ground specified in the notice in question is the construction of a ventilating shaft, which has in fact been already completed. This same ventilating shaft had, indeed, been finished before it became the subject of the former action, the summons in which concluded for a decree ordering the respondents to remove it and to restore the ground to the status quo ante. The ground of this complaint was that the shaft was constructed in ground which was expressly protected against such interference by the 6th section of the respondents' Act of Parliament. The respondents refused to remove the shaft. It was perfectly plain that the question whether the shaft was to come down, as being a contravention of the Act, or not was a difference between the parties in the sense of the section, and must go to arbitration. It went to arbitration, and General Hutchinson, the arbiter appointed by the Board of Trade, has, in so many words, decided that the 6th section applies to this shaft, and that it cannot be allowed to remain.

Now, it seems to me to be perfectly immaterial that the arbiter was reached through the portal of the Court of Session, and I treat his award exactly as I should do if the parties had gone to him direct, as they ought to have done under the Act. The disputed claim is embodied in the summons, and the difference between the parties was whether the shaft was illegal by reason of the 6th section, and must be removed.

Now, in the first place, I cannot think that, even if their present contention were quite new, it will do for a party to go before an arbiter to defend a work attacked on the ground that it is prohibited by a certain enactment,—allow the arbiter to find that the prohibition applies, and that the work is illegal—and then turn round and get the case tried over again on the ground that locally the shaft is not within the area protected by the section. Even if (as I do not think) the ground of defence had been solely that the shaft had been consented to, I should hold that the respondents had waived other grounds of defence and were bound by the result. The plea of “competent and omitted” has certain technical limitations which render the term inappropriate to proceedings outside the Scotch Courts of law. But, even in a Court of law, if a defender, having two pleas available against an action to have him ordained to pull down a building, viz., first, that the section alleged to be contravened does not apply, and, second, that he has complied with its provisions, states only the second plea and not the first, and judgment is given against him, I cannot see how he could afterwards seek to have the building held to be legal on the first and omitted plea.

Nor does it, in my judgment, make the matter at all different that the question now arises under a notice to treat. The complainers’ contention is that, notice or no notice, the shaft is struck at by the 6th section, and they produce General Hutchinson’s decision, which, as I have already said, in so many words, determines first, that the section applies to the shaft, and, second, that the terms of the section have not been complied with.

But then, I must say further that I think that the present contention of the respondents as to the local situation of the shaft was stated in the former action, viz., in the last sentence of the fourth article of the respondents’ statement of facts. It is true that there is no corresponding plea in law, but then I am not aware that a Board of Trade arbiter is bound by the rules of pleading which obtain in our Courts; and General Hutchinson inspected the ground, heard evidence, and explicitly pronounces on the local situation of the shaft. I may add that there is an averment on the present record that the present contention of the respondents was urged by them before General Hutchinson, and rejected by him. Had your Lordships thought fit to remit this averment to probation I should have had no objection, although I think that the summons, record, and the award furnish adequate evidence that the question in dispute has been already decided.

My opinion is that the award of General Hutchinson is final and conclu-

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

DAVID M'FARLANE, boilermaker, Dundee, raised this action against Joseph Lindsay and others, the testamentary trustees of George M'Farlane, Coupar-Angus, the pursuer's father, for reduction of a discharge dated 1st October 1895, granted by the pursuer to the trustees; * and further, and whether decree of reduction were pronounced or not, for an account of the defenders' intromissions.

The pursuer averred (Cond. 4) that the gross amount of the trust-estate was £7000, of which, in terms of the trust-deed, he was entitled to one-eighth, and that he had signed the discharge in reliance upon the statement of David Haggart, solicitor, Dundee, the trustees' law-agent, that everything was in order. That, in January 1896, he had got a copy of the trustees' account of their intromissions, and that he then ascertained that "a commission fee of £300 has been charged by the said defenders' law-agent for realisation of the said trust-estate, in addition to business accounts amounting to about £150. These sums are grossly excessive, and out of all proportion to the work done by the said law-agent."

The pursuer further averred that he had asked the trustees to have the law-agent's accounts audited, but that they had refused. He averred that £250 at least would be taken off the accounts if audited.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having signed the said pretended discharge relying upon the defenders having examined and audited the accounts of the law-agent, which they failed to do, is entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for. (2) The pursuer, as

* In the discharge the pursuer acknowledged receipt of £709, 17s. 10d. as his share of his father's estate, and discharged the trustees and David Haggart, solicitor in Dundee, their agent, and the trust-estate of all claims. a beneficiary under the said trust, is entitled to call upon the defenders to have the said accounts and commission taxed, and for a count and reckoning as concluded for. (3) The defenders having made payment of said accounts and commission without taxation thereof, are liable to the beneficiaries so far as the same are excessively charged. No. 105.

M'Farlane's
Trustees.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The pursuer having granted the said discharge in full knowledge of the facts, and after having had the trustees' accounts under his notice, with time and opportunity to consider the same, the defenders ought to be assolized, with expenses. (4) The accounts of defenders' intromissions and the charges therein being regular and proper, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Production was satisfied, and on 22d October 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) held the defences as defences on the merits.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 27th January 1897, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties in the Procedure-roll, before answer, and under reservation of the defenders' pleas, appoints the defenders to lodge an account of their intromissions, and that within a week, and allows the pursuer to lodge objections thereto, if so advised, within six days thereafter."

On leave obtained, the defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Reduction of the discharge must precede the accounting.¹ The pursuer's averments relating to reduction were irrelevant. His position was that trustees were bound to submit their law-agent's accounts to taxation, even apart from any demand by the beneficiaries. The trustees were under no such absolute obligation. But assuming that the pursuer had a relevant case for reduction, this part of the case must be concluded before he could attack the accounts. The case of *Cockburn*² was not in point. In that case there was no formal account.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary had adopted a practical and judicious course. The pursuer's objection applied to the law-agent's account, and especially to two items. The account had not been taxed.—(LORD YOUNG directed attention to the table of fees for conveyancing and general business, xvii. d.) The table supported the pursuer's complaint of overcharge. The pursuer need not reduce the discharge in order to reach the accounts. The strict doctrine of settled account was not applicable in a question between agent and client, and the case of *Cockburn*² was in point, for there was no distinction between a settled account as in that case, and a formal discharge as in the present case. This was practically a question between agent and client. Since the trustees had omitted and now refused to have their law-agent's accounts taxed, a beneficiary of the trust had a title to demand this.³ At least, if reduction were necessary, the pursuer's averments were relevant. The case of *Macpherson*¹ was distinguishable, for the objections were only brought after long delay, and after the pronouncement of a decree-arbitral and a decree in a multipoleinding.

M'Farlane v.
Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a peculiar case. The facts, so far as not in dispute, are that when the time came for dividing this estate a discharge was presented to each of the beneficiaries discharging not only the trustees but also the law-agent. This was a very unusual course in such a case. The pursuer signed a discharge in these terms. Now, he comes forward to impugn the trustees' accounts, but on one ground only, and that is that the trustees have never done what was their duty, viz., to have the law-agent's account taxed, in order that it might be ascertained that they had not been over-charged. It does appear prima facie that the account was over-charged. All that the pursuer desires is to have it ascertained whether the law-agent is entitled to as much as he has taken credit for in the account as his own remuneration. That is a matter certainly different altogether from the trustees' own intromissions. If the law-agent has over-charged his account, or if the trustees have carelessly allowed him to do so, it cannot be maintained that the beneficiary is not entitled to redress in one form or other. Perhaps it would have been better to raise this action as primarily an accounting, with the reductive conclusions merely ancillary. But what is really the essence of this case is the question whether these charges made by the law-agent are defensible or not. I think the course taken by the Lord Ordinary is well adapted to the purpose of ascertaining what is the proper answer to that question, and I am therefore of opinion that his interlocutor is right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—I can see no objection to the reductive conclusions coming first in the summons. It is immaterial whether they come first or last. So far as the reduction is concerned, it has been disposed of up to the point of considering the case on the merits. The production has been satisfied, and the defences held as defences on the merits.

It was explained that the pursuer is one of eight beneficiaries. After he had signed the discharge in the law-agent's office, his brother obtained a copy of the account.—(His Lordship then read article 4 of the condescendence.) If these charges are true, if it is the case that these sums are grossly excessive for the work done by the law-agent, then nothing has occurred, so far as we are informed, to prevent the trustees having them reduced, and any excess of payment returned to the trust-estate. If this be so, then I think it is their duty to have the over-charges rectified and over-payments returned. The only purpose of this action is to have these excessive charges rectified. The trustees are not barred from having that done. Why they should not do it I do not understand. The question is whether the beneficiaries are precluded by the discharges from having these excessive charges (assuming them to be so) put right, and requiring the trustees to take action to that end. The law-agent wrote to these beneficiaries and got them to come individually and separately to his office, and there at a private meeting he took from each a discharge in the terms of that by the pursuer. Such a proceeding constitutes no obstacle to the law-agent's charges being reduced if excessive. It is not necessary to have the discharges formally set aside. They certainly do not preclude the trustees from taking action, and I think they do not preclude the beneficiaries from asking the trustees to take action. No. 105.

 I concur in what the Lord Ordinary has judiciously done in, as I think, the interest of all parties. The accounts will disclose the details of the law-agents' charges, and it will speedily be ascertained whether they are excessive or not by referring them to a competent person to examine them.  M'Farlane v.
 M'Farlane's
 Trustees.
 If they are right then there is an end of the case. If they are wrong then I have no doubt that the case will come to an end too by the law-agent, against whom I say nothing, refunding the amount charged in excess. I agree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have come to the same conclusion. The purpose of this action is to ascertain whether the beneficiaries have received the full amount to which they are entitled. That being the question, I think the course adopted by the Lord Ordinary is a judicious one, and ought not to be lightly interfered with. The Lord Ordinary's view is this,—There are two items in the trustees' account which are objected to. If these two items are correct, there is no need for any further accounting or for any reduction; if they are not correct, then the Lord Ordinary, inferentially, is of opinion that inquiry ought to be made into these charges, and that such inquiry is not precluded by the discharge.

But it has been urged upon us that inquiry is excluded by the terms of the discharge. Now, I agree with the general principle that a man who in the full knowledge of his rights grants a discharge, is not entitled afterwards to say,—“I have made a mistake and I should not be bound by the discharge which I have signed,” and on such a statement to set the discharge aside. But in this case the pursuer does not propose to open up the trust accounts or to challenge them as a whole. He challenges only two items in the accounts, which appear prima facie to be incorrect. He says to the trustees—“Your duty was to have had these accounts taxed; you did not perform that duty, and I ask you to perform it now.” I think the discharge does not preclude the pursuer from taking that position.

The trustees' duty, whenever the law-agent's charges were challenged, was to have had his account taxed. They did not do so, and I think it should be done now. In this view the course which the Lord Ordinary has taken is the best way of settling the only matter in dispute in the case, and it can do harm to nobody. I am for adhering to this interlocutor.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. The only objection to these accounts is as to two items, being charges by the law-agent, which the pursuer alleges are grossly excessive. It has been disclosed that this case in substance is one between agent and client. That being so, the pursuer is no more bound by the formal discharge which he has granted than he would have been by a docketed account. As the trustees will give no facilities, I think the pursuer is entitled to have the law-agent's accounts examined, notwithstanding the discharge. In this view the course adopted by the

Revenue—Income-Tax—Profits or Gains—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, First Case—City of Glasgow Bank (Liquidation) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. clii.), sec. 17, and First Schedule (Memorandum of Association of the Company), sec. iii., subsections (a), (b), (c), (d), and (h).—In order to enable the liquidation of the City of Glasgow Bank to be finally closed the Assets Company, Limited, was formed in 1882, and acquired from the liquidators the whole assets of the bank in return for a payment sufficient to discharge the outstanding liabilities of the bank, with the expenses of the liquidation, and a general undertaking to pay all debts of the bank which might afterwards emerge. These assets consisted of real and other properties and securities, and of sums which the liquidators expected to recover from the estates of contributors. At the date of the transference the assets stood in the books of the liquidators estimated at certain values, but these values did not represent the amount paid by the company, which would have been the same if the book values had been increased or diminished to any extent.

The income of the company, as stated in the revenue accounts, consisted of the returns from these assets and investments. From time to time the company sold portions of the assets at prices exceeding the book values. The surpluses arising from such sales were not entered as income in the revenue accounts, but were credited to capital under the head of "suspense account for surplus assets." Large sums resulting from such sales and recoveries from debtors were carried to the credit of this account during each year subsequent to 1882, and in 1893 the directors, in terms of an interlocutor of the Court, distributed to the shareholders, from the sum standing in the suspense account, a sum of £15,000 as "repayment of surplus capital."

The Inland Revenue claimed that the company were liable to income-tax for the year 1894-95 on the full amount of the sums carried to the credit of suspense account, and assessed the liability on an average of three years preceding 1894.

In a case for appeal against the assessment, in which the foregoing facts were stated, held that as there was no statement of the price paid for each of the assets at the date of the transference, it was not possible to determine whether the realisation of the assets had resulted in a profit to the company.

Opinions (per Lord Young and Lord Trayner), that when a person buys a doubtful debt and recovers a larger sum than he paid for it, the gain is not profit in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts unless the purchaser is making a trade of buying such debts.

Inland
Revenue.

The case bore :—

"The additional assessment was in respect of profits on sales of assets of the company on the average of three years to the 31st day of December 1893.

"The Assets Company, Limited, was registered in May 1882 in terms of an agreement, dated 11th May 1882, between the City of Glasgow Bank and the liquidators thereof, of the first part; and James L. Boyd and John Wilson for and on behalf of a company to be formed under the Companies Acts, and to be styled 'The Assets Company, Limited,' of the second part.

"The company was formed in order to enable the liquidation of the bank to be finally closed, so as to prevent accumulation of interest on the amount of claims unpaid, and the possibility of any further call on the remaining partners of the bank, and in order to preserve the outstanding assets of the bank for more advantageous realisation than could be effected in the ordinary course of liquidation. Accordingly, one of the objects of the company was, on behalf of the solvent contributories, to acquire from the liquidators of the bank the whole assets summarised in the appendix to the agreement, together with all other assets or rights of the bank, for a payment sufficient to enable the liquidators to pay and discharge the liabilities of the bank, and, in addition, a sum to be held and applied by the liquidators in meeting the expenses of the liquidation so far as not already paid, the company also giving a general undertaking to pay all debts of whatever kind of the bank. The liabilities were estimated to amount to £1,338,116, 6s. 9d. The company was promoted by the committee of contributories who had been appointed to advise with the liquidators in regard to any question arising in the liquidation."

The appendix to the agreement contained the following state of affairs :—

"Shortly after the passing of the said Act the company paid the liquidators the sums agreed on, conform to discharge dated the 12th

"In June 1890 certain preference and ordinary stocks of the New Zealand and Australian Land Company, which were among the assets acquired from the liquidators, were distributed among the shareholders of the appellant company. The market value of the said stock at the date of distribution was £773,462.

"In the state of affairs of the bank as at the 22d day of October 1881, referred to in the minute of agreement, this stock was valued at £802,112, 16s. 10d. Following upon the distribution the capital of the company was reduced to £100,000, in 100,000 shares of £1 each, fully paid. The debentures had been gradually paid off, and in 1890 the debenture debt was entirely extinguished."

"In 1893, in terms of a special resolution duly confirmed by the of the Court, and was entered in the company's accounts, as 'Repay-into shares of larger amount than the amount hereby fixed, or to convert the paid-up shares into stock or to reduce the capital to such an extent and in such a manner as may by such resolution be determined. (h) To invest the moneys of the company upon such securities in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, or elsewhere, as may from time to time be determined."

The articles of association provided,—“44. The company may by a special resolution, but not otherwise, . . . at any time or from time to time sell and dispose of the whole or any part of the business and assets reprebonus, or otherwise, at such rate as they may deem expedient.”

No. 106. From time to time the company sold portions of its assets or investments at prices exceeding the values at which they were estimated in the books of the liquidators. "For many years there were heavy shrinkages on the book values, as shewn above. These were not deducted from revenue, and the appellants were assessed and paid tax on their full revenue without any deduction on account of said shrinkage.

"The surpluses arising from sales" were "not entered in the revenue accounts, but" were "credited to capital under the head of 'Suspense Account for surplus assets.'

"Surpluses from such sales and from recoveries from debtors of the bank have arisen prior to and during the three years of average.

"The company's report for year to 31st December 1893 contains the following statement:—The directors congratulate the shareholders upon the repayment of surplus capital agreed to at meetings held in January and February. The special resolution providing for distribution of £15,000 having been duly confirmed by the Court, this amount, which is equal to 3s. per share, will be paid on 18th current, along with the dividend now recommended. Assets Co.,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

"The Surveyor of Taxes, Mr R. S. Forbes, submitted that, having in view the decisions of the Judges in tax cases, Northern Assurance Company v. Russell,¹ 8th February 1889, and Scottish Investment Trust Company v. Forbes,² 24th November and 12th December 1893, the company was liable to tax on the full amount of its profits from the realisation of its investments, and was properly assessed therefore on an average of three years preceding 5th April 1894.

"We, the Commissioners, refused the appeal (excepting as to any excess of assessment upon an adjustment as before mentioned)."

Argued for the appellants;—The tax proposed was on profits. There were no materials for estimating these. The figures in the liquidators' books did not represent the price paid for the assets. They were mere entries of valuations, and did not affect the consideration granted to the liquidators, which consisted of a sum to cover the amount of the bank's debt, and an obligation to meet any subsequent liability. Not until the assets were all realised could the profits of the company's transaction be ascertained. It was impossible to calculate the profit on the sale of particular assets, for the price paid for each particular asset was not ascertainable. The tax was proposed on sums carried to suspense account, but these were not profits in terms of the Income-tax Acts, even assuming that they did represent the difference between the price paid and the price realised. They represented surplus capital, with which alone the company could deal. They had no power to make payment from the fund acquired by the sale of assets in the way of dividend. It could only be distributed as repayment of capital.³ The tax only affected profits of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade. The company was not a trading concern. It did not trade in these assets. It only existed for their realisation. The mere fact that the buyer of a commodity sold it for a better price than he paid did not render him liable for income-tax, unless he was a trader in the commodity. The company was in the position of such a buyer, and was not a trader. That was clear from the terms of article 3 of the memorandum of association, which only gave power to realise, but not to trade in, the assets. Subsection (b) gave power to purchase, but only for the purpose of finally realising the assets; subsection (d) only applied to stocks taken over from the liquidators, and subsection (h) was merely a subsidiary power to be used incidentally for the main end of realisation. The case of the Scottish Investment Company,² relied on by the Crown, was distinguishable in two respects—(1) that company was entitled to "sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, deal with, or turn

Assets Co.,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

Argued for the Crown;—The Assets Company was a trader. It carried on a trade, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, within the meaning of the statute. The object of its constitution was to make a profit on the sale of the assets taken over. Its articles of association, especially article 44, admitted that it carried on a business. It was a dealer, and the assets were its stock in trade. This was also clear from the terms of the memorandum of association, article 3. In common with other traders, it must accordingly pay income-tax on its profits, which were its income. It might be true that under the terms of its Act of Parliament sums for division were to be deemed capital, but all the same these were "gains" to acquire which the company was formed, and as such were subject to the Income-tax Acts.¹ It was also a settled principle, that although as an ordinary business practice a proportion of commercial profits were entered not as revenue, but as capital to replace the capital disbursed in achieving the profits, still the sum on which income-tax was payable was the gross amount of the profits, and not the sum left as profits after the gains were reduced to make good the capital expended.² It was also settled that when investments of capital were changed and the transaction resulted in a profit, because the investments were sold at a higher price than that at which they had been acquired, the increase so acquired was regarded as part of the profits of a trading company which carried on a "trade, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade."³ Thus the Assets Company was liable in the income-tax charged. The capital of the company was sunk in these investments, and when these were sold at a higher figure it was impossible not to regard the increase as profit in the sense of the Income-tax Acts.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The claim for additional assessment made by the Income-Tax Commissioners, which is the subject of this case, is based upon the ground that the Assets Company has made a profit on the realisation of certain of its assets upon which tax is payable and has not been paid. The profit is said to have been derived from two sources, viz., by prices realised for investments in excess of the amount paid for such investments, and by recoveries from debtors "during the three years of average." If it were established or assumed that the company had made a gain or profit by the realisation of certain stocks or other investments which it held as part of its capital, a somewhat difficult question would arise, namely, whether, looking to the character and constitution of this company, the purpose for which it was formed, and the peculiar transaction under which the assets in question were made over to it, the present case was ruled by the decisions to which we have been referred. If that question had been to be determined I could not, according to my present opinion, concur in all the views expressed in the decided cases. But that question, as it appears to me, does not arise for decision here, because I think we cannot affirm, on the statements in the case before us, that the Assets Company has in fact made the profit in respect of which it is sought to be made liable for the additional assessment. It is impossible to say, in any view of the case, that the Assets Company has realised more for the assets sold than it paid for them without knowing what it paid for them. This important fact is not known to us. When the Assets Company took over the assets of the City of Glasgow Bank still remaining in the hands of the liquidators, the value of such assets was "estimated" by the liquidators, and that estimate we have. But the estimated value was not the price paid by the Assets Company, for, as is stated in the case, "these values did not affect the amount paid to the liquidators, which would have been the same if the book values (i.e., the estimated values) had been increased or diminished to any extent." Accordingly we are not told what was the value of these assets at the time of their transference to the company, nor the price it paid for them. It is not possible, therefore, as I have said, to say whether the price received by the company, on realisation of the assets, is more or less than the price for which they were transferred, and consequently not possible to say that they have been sold at a profit. Farther, the amount of profit on which income-tax is now sought to be imposed consists partly of "recoveries from debtors." But debts recovered (although considered by the creditor not recoverable) are not gain or profit in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts. The amount recovered from debtors must therefore be deducted from the sum on which the tax is claimed. That, however, cannot be done here, because the amount of such recoveries is not given, and that precludes our affirming, as the Commissioners have done, that the whole additional assessment claimed is due and payable. I am of opinion that, on the case as presented to us, we must hold that the determination of the Commissioners is wrong.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that the case presented to us does not contain materials to enable us to decide whether, during the year to 5th April 1895, and two preceding years, profits or gains were made by the Assets Company on the realisation of assets or investments. The data on which we are asked to hold that profits or gains were earned during those years are, I understand, the sums realised on the sale of investments as compared with the values at which the assets realised stood in the books of the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank when taken over by the Assets Company. Now, I do not think that we can take those book values as truly representing the prices paid for the assets or investments. Indeed, the case itself negatives this, because it states that "those values did not affect the amount

There may be great difficulty in obtaining any reliable basis for fixing the prices which should be held to have been paid for any particular asset, because not only was a lump sum paid, but part of the consideration was that the company undertook liabilities of indefinite amount. But whether this is practicable or not, the case does not present materials for deciding that matter.

In so holding I assume that we are bound by the cases of The Northern Assurance Company v. Inland Revenue,¹ and The Scottish Investment Trust Company v. Inland Revenue,² and that if it had been clearly shewn that profits were made by the Assets Company on realisation of its investments, there is nothing in the constitution of the Assets Company or the purposes for which it was formed to prevent such surpluses being treated on the authority of those cases as profits or gains in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts.

But assuming this, we have, as I have said, no materials for affirming that profits or gains were made on the sale of investments during the years in question.

LORD YOUNG.—I intimated my concurrence in the judgment expressed by Lord Trayner, and I also concur in what has been said by Lord Moncreiff, but I wish to give expression to the doubt which I entertain as to the cases in which a gain made by the sale of a property at a price more than was paid for it may be regarded as income. I should like to point out here a source of difficulty in the way of holding that the Crown has made out upon the facts as set forth in the case that there is an assessable income. What is stated in the case is, that the profit on which tax is claimed consists of "surpluses from such sales"—that is, sales of part of the property purchased—"and from recoveries from debtors of the bank," and so on. Now, what about recoveries from debtors? The Company took them over. I should say that I have really no doubt that any person or any company making a trade of purchasing and selling investments will be liable in income-tax upon any profit which is made by that trade. It is quite an intelligible business, just as intelligible as a trade consisting in the purchase and sale of goods in the ordinary trade of a merchant or shopkeeper. The trade is good or bad according as it is carried on profitably or not, and the profit arises from purchasing goods at the trader's price and in selling them at a retail price or wholesale price or larger price than that which was paid for them. But it is another proposition altogether, that where no trade is carried on, a gain or loss upon the purchase and re-sale of property comes within the meaning of the Income-tax Acts. Take even proper traders. If proper traders sell their old premises and buy new ones, and sell the old premises at a higher price than they paid for them, investing the price which they get in the purchase of a site and the erection of new premises, I should say it was a totally untenable proposition that anything in excess of what they had paid for the old premises perhaps twenty years before, at a better time for purchasing property, is income within the meaning of the Acts. I do not think it is at all. It is no more so in the case of a trader than in the case of a private individual selling his house at more than he had paid for it, or selling his carriage or pictures at more than he paid for them. That is not income in any sense, although a dealer in pictures, like a dealer in goods or a dealer in the buying and selling of houses, who made it a trade, would come within the region of income-tax. But this company in realising more for the debts which they had purchased were not making a trade of buying and selling debts. There is nothing to indicate that. Anybody who makes a trade of buying and selling doubtful debts will be liable, upon the principle which I have indicated, in income-tax upon any gain which he makes by that trade. But it is no part of this case that that was the trade of this company. They took over all the debts of the bank and they undertook to pay them. On the other hand, they got assigned to them all the debts due to the bank by doubtful debtors, and which the bank could not immediately realise, and which it was inconvenient for them to wait on for; they bought these. Is it to be said that they were making a trade of buying and selling doubtful debts? There is nothing to indicate that in the least. The proposition that where anybody purchases a doubtful debt and realises more than he paid for it—there being only one purchase, and the purchaser not being a trader in that kind of thing—such gain is income, is, I think, a proposition which cannot be sustained. Now, I think we have nothing upon the face of this case to shew that in a trade of buying and selling there was income or gain made by this company upon which the assessment is made.

I have expressed these views as indicating generally what is in my mind in regard to this particular case. It may be that there is income from trading upon which this company has not been assessed; but if that be so, the Inland Revenue will be able to state a better case with more intelligible detail of facts, which will enable the Court to judge of it in another year. In regard to what we have here, I entirely agree with Lord Trayner and Lord Moncreiff that there is no case upon which we can with safety sustain the conclusions at which the Commissioners have arrived.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I also concur.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and found the appellants entitled to expenses.

There was medical opinion to the effect that although not insane the girl was mentally and physically weak, and incapable of earning her own living. After a year of service she ran away, and having been found in a state of destitution on the public road, she obtained parochial relief. In an action at the instance of the relieving parish, held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that the girl had not been forisfamiliated, and that the parish of her father's settlement was liable for the sums disbursed on her behalf.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF BRECHIN raised this action for decree ordaining either the Parish Council of the Barony Parish of Glasgow or the Parish Council of Perth to pay the sum disbursed by the pursuers for the relief of a pauper, Jessie Marshall, and further to free and relieve the pursuers of future disbursements on her behalf.

The pauper was born in the Barony Parish of Glasgow on 12th July 1876. Her father, James Marshall, was born in the parish of Perth, and the pursuers maintained that he had never acquired a residential settlement.

The Parish Council of the Barony Parish of Glasgow maintained that the pauper was of weak intellect, and had never been forisfamiliated, and that she was chargeable against her father's birth settlement.

The Parish Council of Perth maintained that the pauper had been forisfamiliated, and that she was chargeable against the parish of her birth.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) allowed a proof, which disclosed the following facts:—James Marshall worked as a painter in summer, and sometimes was able to take a house of his own. In winter he travelled about the country as a hawker, and lived in lodging-houses in the various towns which he visited. In Laurencekirk he lived in the lodging-house kept by John Laing and his wife. In April 1893 Marshall left his daughter in this lodging-house under an agreement whereby she was to take care of Laing's children, and to help Mrs Laing in housework, in return for her food and clothing. It was agreed that she should return to her father whenever she or Laing desired. She remained until April 1894, when she ran away. Laing followed her to Montrose, and after vainly trying to get her admitted to the poorhouse there he took her back to Laurencekirk. A few days after she again ran away to Montrose where she was admitted to the poorhouse. She left on 31st May 1894, and stayed with her father in a lodging-house in Brechin. He left her there without providing for her, and on a report by a medical man, that, although not insane, she was mentally and physically weak and incapable of earning her own living, she was admitted to the almshouse in Brechin, where she stayed till 7th August, when she went with her stepmother to Montrose. There she worked for two months in a lodging-house, receiving in return her food and clothes. For a few months thereafter, she lived with her father, working by day for a neighbour who gave her food. In April 1895 she ran away, and was found in the model lodging-house, Brechin, along with a pedlar and his wife. On 26th April she was found on a road near Brechin in a destitute condition, and was admitted to the Brechin Almshouse on a medical certificate in terms similar to the certificate above mentioned. On 29th June 1896 she was removed by her father, and in October she returned alone to a lodging-house in Montrose, where, at the date of the case, she was working for food and clothes. It appeared that she was sometimes able to pay for her lodging in various lodging-houses.

On 3d December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pauper, Jessie Marshall, mentioned on record, has not been forisfamiliated, and has therefore not acquired any residential settlement in the parish of Brechin; that her settlement is in the parish of Perth, being that of her father's birth, and not in the Barony Parish of Glasgow, being that of her own birth: Therefore decerns against the defenders the Parish Council of Perth conform to the conclusions of the summons: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defenders the Parish Council of the Barony Parish of Glasgow from the conclusions of the summons, so far as directed against them, and decerns: Finds the pursuers and the defenders the Barony Parish entitled to their expenses against the defenders the Parish Council of Perth."*

The defenders, the Parish Council of Perth, reclaimed, and argued;—The pauper had been forisfamiliated. This was a question of fact.¹ (1) She was sixteen years of age when left with the Laings; (2) after that time she was not resident with her father, who (3) never after that time contributed to her support. She supported herself, and was sometimes even able to pay for her lodging. But the important fact was her separation from her father's family, and this was conclusive.² The pauper was not insane, but only mentally weak, and accordingly

* "OPINION.—The sole question in this case appears to me to be whether Jessie Marshall was forisfamiliated when she received parochial relief.

"In considering whether the circumstances of a particular case amount to forisfamiliation the capacity of the child is an important element. In this case I do not think that there is any doubt as to the pauper's mental condition. She is not a lunatic, or insane, nor do I think that she could properly be described as an imbecile. She is, however, congenitally of weak mind. So far all the witnesses agree, although they vary somewhat in their estimate of her capacity. Her mental capacity appears to me to be not greater than that of a child of seven or eight years old. She can do simple household work under supervision, and she is fond of young children, and can be entrusted to look after them, but that is no more than can be said of many girls of twelve years. Further, although she can be entrusted with one message, if she is given two or three she becomes confused. In that respect she seems to be inferior to an ordinary intelligent child of seven or eight. It is therefore clear that she was not fit to leave her father's family and to lead an independent life. [His Lordship then narrated the evidence, and proceeded]:—

"I think that that evidence shews that when the girl was left with the Laings she did not pass out of her father's family and become free of his paternal control. She was left under a temporary arrangement made by her father, and considering the wandering life which he was leading, I think that it was a very prudent arrangement. It was just such an arrangement as a man in Marshall's position might have made for a child of seven or eight years old who was able to assist sufficiently in a household to be worth her board and lodgings.

"The pauper's stay with the Laings came to an end by her running away. She did so twice. The first time Laing found her, and brought her back, but she ran away again a few days afterwards, and was found wandering about the roads, and taken to the inspector of poor of Brechin.

"In these circumstances I think that it is clear that she was not forisfamiliated, and the expense of her maintenance during the time when she was in the Brechin Almshouse must therefore be borne by the parish of her father's settlement."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we do not require to call for any reply, and that we are in a position to decide this case upon the facts as they have been explained to us by Mr Campbell. This child did not live with her father, but in a lodging-house at Laurencekirk. She did not take up her residence there of her own accord, but she was put there by her father, who arranged that she was to return to him when either she or the lodging-house keeper desired that she should do so. In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to regard this girl as occupying an independent position, and I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has given the right decision in the case.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship.

This child, when she became chargeable, was, in my opinion, still a member of her father's family. Although he was a tramp, it is possible to regard him as having a family, and as bound to provide for and maintain the members of it. He certainly put this child in a house where she got her food, clothes, and shelter, but he did not thereby sever her from his family. In the arrangement he made with the lodging-house keeper he recognised that when either he or the child ceased to desire that her service should continue, it was his duty to receive her back to his family and provide for her.

In my opinion the Lord Ordinary has properly decided this case.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Investment on security of harbour rates and 48 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 3 (b), 10 and 12—Municipal Corporation.—The Trusts Amendment Act, 1884, authorised trustees (including judicial factors) to invest in loans (10) "on real or heritable securities" (12) "on debentures secured on rates or taxes levied" under statutory powers "by municipal corporations."

A curator bonis lent a sum to Greenock Harbour Trustees, a corporation consisting of the Magistrates and Council, and nine elected trustees, on a debenture, in which they assigned to the creditor "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust." Held that the investment was not on real security nor on a debenture granted by a municipal corporation in the sense of the Act. Held further that it was not a proper investment at common law in respect that the revenue of the trust from dues, &c., was precarious.

On 7th February 1855 Mr James Cowan was appointed curator bonis to Joseph M'Cormick Ferrie.

On 8th May 1895 Mr Cowan presented a petition for recall of his appointment and discharge, on the ground of advanced age. 1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Pearson.

On 8th June 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) recalled the appointment of Mr Cowan, and appointed Francis Adam Bringloe, C.A., to be curator bonis to the ward.

In the subsequent proceedings for Mr Cowan's discharge a question was raised by Mr Bringloe as to the competency of certain investments made by Mr Cowan with the curatorial funds, and before the question was determined Mr Cowan died, and his trustees and executors were sisted in his room and place as petitioners.

The following narrative of the circumstances giving rise to the question is taken from the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—

"The investments challenged are three in number:—(1) On 10th May 1882 Mr Cowan uplifted a sum of £300, and invested it on a four per cent mortgage with the Port-Glasgow Harbour Trust. (2) On 4th September 1882 he uplifted an additional sum of £700, which he lent to the Greenock Harbour Trustees on a four per cent mortgage or assignment. (3) On 12th May 1887 he purchased at the price of £970 a £1000 assignment of the last mentioned Trust.*

* The assignment for £700 by the Greenock Harbour Trustees, was as follows:—"By virtue of the Greenock Port and Harbours Acts, 1866, 1867, 1872, and 1880, the trustees of the port and harbours of Greenock, in consideration of the sum of £700 sterling paid to them by James Cowan . . . do hereby bind themselves to pay to the said James Cowan, as curator bonis foressaid, and to his successors in office, and his or their assigns, the principal sum of £700 at the principal office of the trustees, on the 11th day of November 1889, with a fifth part more of liquidate penalty in case of failure, together with interest on the said principal sum at the rate of four pounds per centum per annum, payable half-yearly (as per coupons or interest warrants delivered herewith), or in the option of the said James Cowan or his foressaids, the said principal sum shall thereafter, in virtue hereof, remain as a loan to the said trustees until the expiry of a further term of years to be afterwards agreed on, or the said principal sum shall be payable at the dates, and subject to the provisions contained in the said Acts in the same manner as if the said sum had been advanced on the day of payment first above specified, without any period being fixed for the repayment thereof, and subject to the provisions of the said Acts, the trustees do hereby assign and make over to the said James Cowan, as curator bonis foressaid, and to his successors in office, and his or their assigns, All and Sundry the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, payable to the trust in virtue of the said Acts, and all their right, title, and interest of, in, and to the same, to be held by the said assignee and his foressaids until the said sum of £700 with the interest thereof, shall be fully satisfied and paid.—In witness whereof."

The assignment for £1000 was in similar terms to the foregoing.

The mortgage of the Port-Glasgow Harbour Trust was as follows:—"By virtue of the Port-Glasgow Harbour Consolidation Act, 1864, we, the trustees of Port-Glasgow Harbour, in consideration of the sum of £300 paid to the treasurer to the said trustees by James Cowan . . . for the purposes of the said Act, do grant and assign to the said James Cowan and his

The rights of the different classes of assignment-holders having been determined in a special case (15 R. 343), an Act was passed in 1888 authorising the Greenock Harbour Trustees to issue A and B debenture stock in lieu of the existing assignments, the A debenture stock and interest being declared to have priority. Mr Cowan's investments were of the postponed class, and in September 1888 a certificate of £1700 B debenture stock was issued in his name, the market value of which is stated to be £633, 5s.

"The Port-Glasgow Harbour Trust having also fallen into difficulties, obtained an Act in 1890, which authorised the trustees to convert their mortgage debt into debenture stock at a reduced rate of interest, and a certificate for £300 of it, bearing $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent interest, was issued in name of Mr Cowan, which is stated to be now worth about £90.

"In and after 1888 the Accountant of Court in the annual audit drew special attention to the Greenock Harbour Trust debentures, and then passed them 'subject to all questions.'"

On 9th June 1896, Mr Bringlee lodged a minute setting forth the circumstances, and declining as curator bonis to take over the investments as representing any part of the curatory estate. † "OPINION.—Mr James Cowan was appointed curator bonis to Joseph M'Cormick Ferrie in 1855. In 1895, on the ground of failing health, he petitioned for recall and discharge and the appointment of a new curator. While the question of his discharge was pending, Mr Cowan died on 23d November 1895, and his trustees and executors have now sisted themselves as parties to the proceedings.

"The original value of the ward's estate was between £700 and £800, but by accumulations of interest, invested from time to time, it reached a nominal value of over £2000.

"The question now arising in Mr Cowan's discharge is, whether he incurred personal liability for loss upon certain of these investments; and as the loss has not yet been ascertained, the proposal is that his executors should take over the investments and replace the amounts with interest. The parties are willing that the question should be decided now, and in this process. . . .

"The investments are now challenged on the ground that they are not within the classes of investment open to trustees and judicial factors. If the class of investments was legitimate, it is not contended that liability

No. 108. Mr Bringloe reclaimed, and argued ;—The investments in question were not legitimate investments for a factor to make either at common law or under the Trusts Acts. (1) They were not within the class already recognised by the Court. The earliest direction given appeared to be that the factor should act as prudence required,¹ and his discretion had always been strictly limited. The investment of curatorial funds was at first restricted to Government stock and heritable securities.² In Grainger's case,³ although an investment secured on rates was approved, the Court proceeded on the ascertained merits of the particular security, and would not have sanctioned a priori a security of that class. The case, therefore, was not in favour of the present factor, for he was asking the Court to condone an investment the history of which had proved its insufficiency. Railway debentures were at first excluded,⁴ though subsequently permitted.⁵ No other kind of security had been recognised at common law. (2) A further extension of the class of securities was made by

has been incurred by reason of their being in themselves improvident or improperly selected.

"The investments are sought to be supported on three separate grounds :—(1) That they are investments on heritable or real security, and so within both the common law rule and the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1884 ; (2) that they are analogous to investments which the Court has already recognised, and that it would be no undue extension of the rule to hold these as legitimate investments in judicial factories ; and (3) that they are mortgages secured on rates or taxes levied under Act of Parliament by municipal corporations with borrowing powers, and therefore fall within the express words of sec. 3, subsec. 12, of the Act of 1884.

"I have arrived, though with difficulty, at the conclusion that they may be supported on the first of these grounds. It is true that the terms of the assignments themselves do not expressly include the undertaking, which is largely or in great part heritable. In the Greenock Harbour assignments the trustees assign, subject to the provisions of the Acts, 'all and sundry the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust payable to the trust in virtue of the said Acts, and all their right, title, and interest, of, in, and to the same.' And in the case of the Port-Glasgow Harbour there is assigned a proportion of the 'rates, revenues, and other moneys' leviable under the Act. In this respect these securities differ from the ordinary railway mortgage, which assigns 'the said undertaking and all the tolls and sums of money arising by virtue of the Act.' But there is here, as in the case of railways, and in terms substantially the same, a power to apply for the appointment of a judicial factor, as the prescribed mode in which the security is to be worked out, and notwithstanding the important difference in form to which I have adverted, it appears to me that in substance the security obtained is a security over the undertaking in the same sense and to the same effect as in the case of a railway. Now, railway mortgages have been expressly held, in the matter of trust investments, to fall within the expression 'investment upon real securities,' as used in an English will—Breatcliff v. Bransby's Trustees (1887), 14 R. 307.

"There is a peculiarity in the case of the Greenock Harbour assignments the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63), No. 108. sec. 3, and it was said that the present investments had been made on heritable or real security, and were therefore, if not within the common law rule, within the Act. That was the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, but he had misunderstood Breatcliff's case,¹ on which he relied. The question in that case was confined to the construction of a power in an English will, and it was held that a railway mortgage was a real security in the sense of the will. But the terms of the debenture here were essentially different from the terms of the mortgage there, for here the real property of the harbour trustees was not conveyed, whereas the railway undertaking was. It had already been held that an assignation of the Greenock Harbour Trust was not a real security.² The word "real" in the statute was the English equivalent of the Scots "heritable," and it was introduced into the Act so as to cover English securities. But a real or heritable security was something which the creditor could realise and sell. Its basis was land, and the security had to be completed by infestment; it was not enough that it was in some way connected with a real right, or even that it entitled the creditor to enter into possession. It was true that a creditor here, provided that his debt amounted to £5000, could apply for the appointment of a judicial factor, but the factor could only act as a receiver of the income of the undertaking. He had no power to sell it.³ In Breatcliff's case¹ the factor appointed under the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867 which might be considered to touch this point. The report² of the special case discloses that in a certain class of the assignments,—namely, those issued in the form prescribed by the Act of 1872,—there were assigned in security not only 'the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust,' but also the 'works and property of the trust.' The dispute there raised being between different classes of security holders, it was contended by those who held assignments in this form that they thereby got an additional security upon which real diligence could be expedite. This view was negatived, it being held that the insertion of the words 'works and property of the trust' was really 'not meant to have any practical effect at all.' Thus all were held to be on one level as regards the extent of the security, and those holding assignments in the form now in dispute were declared to be in no worse position than those who had an express assignment to the works and property. Accordingly this point is rather favourable than otherwise to the view contended for by Mr Cowan's executors.

"Looking to the substance of the thing, and having regard to the decision in the case of Breatcliff, I think the investments may be supported as being truly loans on real or heritable security. They were indeed a postponed class of securities, but, as I have said, no question was raised as to the propriety or judiciousness of the investments if they are otherwise admissible. It is right I should add that no separate argument was submitted as to the Port-Glasgow Harbour mortgage, it being assumed that this is in all material respects in the same case as the others.

"It becomes unnecessary for me to deal with the other two grounds on which these investments were defended. But I may say that as at present advised I could not have sustained them on either of these grounds."

No. 108. (30 and 31 Vict. c. 126), was entitled to realise.¹ (3) This was not a municipal security in the sense of the Trusts Act. What the statute had in view was clearly a corporation connected solely with the civic life of the community. The Greenock Harbour Trust no doubt included the Town-council of Greenock just as the Clyde Trust did, but neither of these bodies had to do with civic life. The trust had no power of taxing, but merely a restricted right of levying harbour dues.

Trustees v.
Ferrie's
Curator Bonis.

Argued for the respondents ;—The Lord Ordinary was right. (1) The security was of a class analogous to those already sanctioned by the Court.² It might be a bad security of a permitted class, but that did not entail liability for loss on the factor. (2) The security was a real security in the sense of the Trusts Act. "Real" had a wider meaning than "heritable." If it were merely equivalent to "heritable," then the statutory provision was unnecessary, for heritable securities had long been recognised as competent. Breachcliff's case³ was directly in point. True, the word "real" there occurred in a will, but why should it have a different meaning in a statute? The decision was subsequent to the statute. The creditors of the Harbour Trust had a real right in the subject of their security, for they could take possession of it to the exclusion of everyone else. They were very much in the position of a heritable creditor in possession under a decree of mails and duties. The debentures did not merely express an obligation, they contained an assignment—a transfer of property—a transfer in perpetuity of the rates and dues. The observations of the Lord Ordinary in Breachcliff's case³ went too far if they meant that the factor of the railway undertaking, which was the subject of the security in that case, could dispose of or sell the undertaking at his own hand. He had no such power, but required the sanction of Parliament.⁴ The factor who might be appointed here was in the same position. There was no distinction therefore between the security held to be "real" in Breachcliff's case³ and the security here. (3) This was a municipal security. The harbour was originally, and indeed down to 1866, administered by the Town-council alone, and under their Acts they had expressly power to levy "rates." The fact that there had been a change in the administrative body, bringing in shipowners and others, did not make the trustees the less a municipal corporation, nor did it make any difference that it was a trust separate from the town-council. That was often the case with a water trust or gas trust.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The late Mr Cowan was appointed curator bonis on the estate of Mr Ferrie. On the 8th June 1895 Mr Cowan's appointment was recalled, on the ground of age and ill-health, when Mr Bringloe was appointed curator bonis in his place.

In the course of auditing Mr Cowan's accounts, with a view to his discharge, it appeared that he had, in the course of his management of the curatorial estate, invested in May 1882 a sum of £300 on a mortgage by the trustees of Port-Glasgow Harbour, and two farther sums of £700 and £970, in September 1882 and May 1887 respectively, on mortgages or assignments by the trustees of the ports and harbours of Greenock. As it appeared that a considerable loss would result to the estate on realising these investments, Mr Bringloe objected to Mr Cowan receiving credit for them, on the ground that they were not within the class of securities on which a curator bonis was, at his own hand, entitled to invest the curatorial estate.

Mr Cowan has since died, and is now represented by his trustees, who have been sisted as petitioners in his place.

If the investments in question were within the class which Mr Cowan was entitled to take, it is not said that they are improper of their kind, or such as he should not have taken.

The sole question therefore between the parties is, whether Mr Cowan was entitled to invest the estate under his charge in securities of the class or kind in question, and I understand that both parties desire that his liability in that respect should be determined in the present proceedings.

Argument before us was confined to the assignments or mortgages by the Greenock Harbour Trustees, from which I conclude that there is no difference in effect between them and the Port-Glasgow Harbour mortgage.

By the assignment of 22d September 1882 the trustees of the Port and Harbour of Greenock, by virtue of the Greenock Port and Harbour Acts, 1866, 1867, 1872, and 1880, in consideration of £700 paid to them by Mr Cowan as curator bonis, bound themselves to pay to him as curator bonis foressaid and his successors in office, and his or their assignees, the sum of £700 on the 11th November 1889, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent (as per coupons or interest warrants delivered therewith), or in his or his foressaid's option should thereafter remain as a loan; and, subject to the provisions of the foressaid Acts, they thereby assigned and made over to him and his foressaid all and sundry the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust payable to the trust in virtue of the said Acts, and all their right, title, and interest of, in, and to the same, to be held by the said assignee and his foressaid until the said sum of £700, with interest thereof, should be fully satisfied and paid.

The only statutory mode by which the mortgagees can enforce payment of their debts is, I think, to be found in the 69th and 70th sections of the Act of 1880.

By the 69th section it is enacted that the mortgagees may enforce payment of arrears of interest or principal, or principal and interest due on the mortgages, by the appointment of a judicial factor. In order to authorise the appointment of a judicial factor in respect of arrears of principal, it is provided, that the amount owing to the mortgagees by whom the application for a judicial factor shall be made should not be less than £5000 in the whole.

Section 70 enacts that the Sheriff may, on any such application, appoint some person to receive the whole or any competent part of the rates and

No. 108. duties and other revenues of the trust until all the arrears of interest or of principal, as the case may be, then due on the outstanding mortgages, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the said rates and duties and other revenues, be fully paid. It is farther enacted that upon such appointment being made, all such rates, duties, and other revenues shall be paid to and received by the person so appointed, and that the money so received shall be so much money received by or to the use of the mortgagees, and that so soon as the full amount of any interest or principal in arrear and costs has been so received, the power of such judicial factor shall cease; and it is provided that such judicial factor shall distribute among all the mortgagees to whom interest or principal shall be in arrear, the rates and duties and other moneys which shall come into his hands, having respect in such distribution to the priorities, if any, of such mortgagees.

Cowan's
Trustees v.
Ferrie's
Curator Bonis.

Such is the investment or security in question taken by the judicial factor. It was maintained that it fell within the class of investments which a judicial factor was entitled to take under section 3 (b) of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1884, which, inter alia, authorises investments of trust or curatorial funds on real or heritable securities in Great Britain, and that this was a real security in the sense of the Act, or if not so, it was at anyrate a mortgage secured on rates and taxes levied under the authority of an Act of Parliament by a municipal corporation authorised to borrow money on such security, which is also permitted by the said Act.

The Lord Ordinary has arrived at the conclusion, although—as he says, with difficulty—that the competency of the investment by the curator may be sustained on the first of these grounds. I have been unable to arrive at the same conclusion. It will be observed that only one of the investments in question was taken subsequent to the Act of 1884, but if the curator would have been entitled to take such investments after the passing of the Act, it may well be maintained that he was entitled to retain them after the passing of the Act although taken before.

It will be observed that what is assigned by the mortgage in security of the debt are “all and sundry the rates, dues, and other revenues of the trust.” There is no conveyance or assignation of the undertaking itself in security of the debt. There are no means provided by the Harbour Acts by which the heritable subjects or real property of the trust can be attached or realised for payment of the creditors. As I have pointed out, the duty of any judicial factor who may be appointed under these Acts is limited to receiving and distributing the rates, dues, and other revenues of the trust. Moreover, the curator, as an individual creditor, could not put this remedy in force, because his debt is under the requisite amount of £5000.

Neither do I know of any process by which at common law the real property of the trust could be attached and applied for the payment of the creditors.

Moreover, it appears to me that when the Trusts Act authorised curators to invest in real securities, it meant securities in which the value of the real subjects pledged should be alone or primarily looked to or regarded as sufficient to secure repayment of the proposed loan. But in making a loan of the kind in question, the lender does not look to the value of the real property as being a sufficient security for payment of his debt. What he primarily, if not solely, looks to, and in this case what he could only look to, is the amount of revenue earned by the harbour trustees as owners of a harbour,—that is, harbour dues and rates, and which are by the Acts appropriated to payment of the mortgages. I cannot think that a loan of this character is a loan on real or heritable security in the sense of the Act.

No. 108.
Feb. 26, 1897.
Cowan's
Trustees v.
Ferrie's
Curator Bonis.

The Court had to consider this question in the case of the Greenock Harbour Trustees.¹ The late Lord President there said,—“It must be observed that the securities which are granted for money advanced under this Act (1880) are not real securities in any proper sense of the term. There is nothing done by that Act to confer or make a real security.” This opinion was concurred in by the rest of the Court. I also concur in it, and think that the loan cannot be supported on the ground that it is a loan on real security.

With reference to the case of Breachcliff,² which seems mainly to have influenced the Lord Ordinary's opinion, that case appears to me to be essentially different from the present. In that case it was held that an English will which empowered the trustees to invest on real security authorised an investment on a railway mortgage. The ground of the judgment will be found in the Lord Ordinary (Lord Kinnear's) opinion,—“The question is,” he says, “whether a mortgage of the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway is a real security within the meaning of the power. I think it is, because it gives to the mortgagee the security of the whole undertaking,—that is, of the whole real and moveable property of the company. It is true that it is a security which cannot be made available to the creditor by the ordinary diligence of the law. But he has a different kind of diligence in his right to obtain the appointment of a judicial factor, through whose administration the undertaking may be managed or disposed of for the benefit of the company's creditors. The mortgagee has therefore the security of the real property, which is what is meant by a real security.”

In this case the mortgagee has not the security of the undertaking,—that is, the real property of the trust,—and a judicial factor would have no power to dispose of it for the benefit of the creditors.

The investment was further supported on the ground that it fell within section 3 (b), 12, of the Trust Amendment Act, as being a mortgage secured on rates or taxes levied under the authority of an Act of Parliament by a municipal corporation authorised to borrow money on such security.

The Greenock Harbour Trustees, which is the corporation granting the mortgages in question, consisted at that date of the Magistrates and Council of Greenock, and of nine persons elected by owners of or in ships to a certain extent registered in the Port of Greenock, and by certain ratepayers paying rates leviable on vessels or goods.

I am clearly of opinion that such a compound body cannot be considered a municipal corporation in the sense of the Act. I think a “municipal corporation” there means a town-council or county council, or some similar body. I also doubt whether the rates and duties which the trustees are entitled to levy, and which are payments made in return for services rendered, are of the nature of the rates or taxes referred to in the Act, which rather appear to me to be rates or taxes for payment of which the municipal corporation is entitled to assess the community.

The only question which remains is, whether the curator, in the exercise of his powers at common law, was entitled to make the investment in question.

On this part of the case, we were referred to the case of Grainger's Curator.¹ In that case the Court did no more than sanction the retention of certain investments which had been made by the curator. These investments were secured on rates leviable under the Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Act, the Sheriff Court-Houses Act, and the Aberdeenshire Road Act, and were reported by the Accountant of Court to be unexceptionable. These investments appear to be different in character from the present. There was no element of speculation in them. The sufficiency of the security depended solely on the power of assessing the community, whereas in this case the sufficiency of the security depended, as the result has shewn, on the success or nonsuccess of the harbour trustees in carrying on their business as owners of the Port and Harbour of Greenock.

In the case of Lloyd's Curator,² the Court held that railway debentures are not excluded from the class of investments allowed for factory funds, if the judicial factor and the Accountant thought the security a good one of its class.

I have already had occasion to point out the difference between a railway debenture and an investment like the present. I do not think that there is anything to be found in these cases to entitle the curator bonis to make the investments in question, and prior to these cases I do not think there was any law or practice entitling him to do so.

As I have said, no separate argument was addressed to us regarding the Port-Glasgow Harbour mortgage, and on the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be reversed.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I only desire to add, with reference to the case of Breatcliff v. Bransby's Trustees,³ that I think with Lord Adam that that case decides only that certain railway mortgages were within the class of securities authorised by a particular will. The decision rules so much as is necessary for that purpose, and nothing more. Counsel for the respondent referred to observations that were made in that case, for the purpose, as I understood the argument, of shewing that there is not really any such material difference as Lord Adam has held—and as I think rightly held—between the position of a judicial factor on a railway undertaking under the Act of 1867,⁴ and the position of a judicial factor appointed under the Acts now in question, inasmuch as the Court had ascribed to the judicial factor in the case of *Breatcliff*³ powers which he does not really possess; because it was said, and I think quite rightly, that a judicial factor cannot, at his own hand, dispose of a railway undertaking by selling it as a going concern. Now, I think the phrase on which that argument was based is not very exact; and, if it were intended, which does not seem probable, No. 108. to indicate that a judicial factor could sell a railway undertaking at his own hand, then I should think it unsound. Because it cannot be maintained Feb. 26, 1897. that the duties which Parliament has imposed and the powers which it has Cowan's Trustees v. Ferrie's Curator Bonis. conferred upon statutory corporations could be transferred in that way by an ordinary contract of purchase and sale, so as to enable the seller effectually to make over and deliver the subject of the contract to a purchaser. But then if that were a just criticism, it would only shake the authority of Breatcliff,¹ and would certainly afford no reason for carrying that decision further. But I see no reason to doubt that the powers of the judicial factor were quite correctly appreciated in the case of Breatcliff.¹ The real distinction which there is between the case of a judicial factor on the undertaking of a railway company under the statute of 1867 and the officer who may be appointed upon the application of the mortgagees in this case is very clearly brought out in the first case of Haldane v. The Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Company,² where the Lord President points out that by the appointment of a judicial factor under the statute then in question a new kind of diligence is given to the creditors, in place of the ordinary rights of which the Legislature had deprived them to the public benefit. And his Lordship makes it very clear what are the powers of a judicial factor, and that he actually enters into possession of the entire undertaking of the railway for the benefit of the creditors, with full powers of management for their benefit, and therefore his appointment enables the creditors, through him, to enter into possession of the subject of the security. That he may carry out his powers by ultimately disposing of the railway is made clear by the second case of Haldane v. The Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Company,³ because there the Court dismissed an application by the judicial factor to authorise him to receive offers for the sale of the railway, on the ground that it was superfluous, inasmuch as he had that power of necessity by his appointment, and was quite entitled and justified in making arrangements for receiving offers for a sale provisionally. But then his Lordship added, what is very obvious, that he could not carry out any contract of sale, and therefore could not make a binding contract of sale without coming to the Court for powers to apply for an Act of Parliament to carry out the contract. But the result of his position is that he is enabled to manage, and in certain circumstances to realise, the subject of the security for the benefit of the creditors.

Upon the other points of the case I agree entirely with all that Lord Adam has said.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT found that the £300 debenture of the Port-Glasgow Harbour Trust, and the £700 and £1000 debentures of the Greenock Harbour Trust, were not legitimate investments of curatorial funds, and that the petitioners, the trustees and executors of Mr James Cowan, were liable for the loss which had been incurred or might be incurred thereon, &c.

Lease—Bankruptcy—Trust for creditors—Compensation.—By the lease of a farm, the landlord, in the event of the tenant becoming insolvent, had the option to terminate the lease, and in the event of his exercising this option he was bound to settle with the tenant as if the lease had naturally expired. Under the lease the tenant became entitled on its termination to the value of certain meliorations on buildings taken over by him from the previous tenant as the same might be fixed by arbitration, and the general regulations of the estate, which were incorporated in the lease, inter alia provided,—“The outgoing and incoming tenants must settle between themselves regarding the payment of crop, manure, and other things, without any responsibility on the heritor, unless the heritor choose to interfere.”

The tenant having become insolvent and having granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, the landlord terminated the lease and let the farm to a new tenant. Thereafter the landlord and the trustee entered into a reference to have the value of the meliorations on buildings and of the manure, &c., fixed. Under this reference the value was fixed at £189, 1s.

The trustee having brought an action against the landlord for payment of this sum, the landlord pleaded compensation in respect of a sum of £197, 12s. 6d., being the amount of arrears of rent due by the tenant. The trustee maintained that the plea of compensation was ill founded in respect (1) that the landlord having the option under the lease of either leaving the tenant to settle with the incoming tenant for meliorations, manure, &c., or of himself settling with the tenant, the agreement under which he elected the latter course was to be regarded as constituting an obligation incurred to the trustee subsequently to the tenant's insolvency, to which (in accordance with Taylor's Trustees v. Paul, 15 R. 313) the doctrine of compensation was inapplicable; and in respect (2) that the landlord having (as the trustee averred) acceded to the trust, the trustee was vested in the tenant's right to the manure, &c., free of any obligation to compensate.

Held that both claims arose out of the contract of lease, and that the plea of compensation fell to be sustained.

Question (per Lord Moncreiff), whether, if the tenant's estates had been sequestrated, the plea of compensation would have fallen to be sustained.

2d DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

By lease dated 5th February 1880, John Henderson Milne, of Craigellie, Aberdeenshire, let the farm of Mosstown of Craigellie to James Jaffray for nineteen years, and crops from Whitsunday 1880, at the yearly rent of £56, 10s., upon the terms stipulated in the lease, and in the general regulations and conditions for farming of the estate of Craigellie prefixed to the lease.

In the regulations and conditions were, inter alia, the following:—“No. 2. In the event of the tenant's bankruptcy or public insolvency, he shall, in the option of the heritor, forfeit his lease, so far as unexpired at the time, and shall be bound to remove when required. It is also declared that, if the tenant shall fail to make payment of any of the half year's rent within six months after the term of payment, so that one year's rent shall be due and unpaid at one time, the lease shall thereupon, in the option of the heritor, become null and void, and the tenant shall be bound to remove when required. In the event of the heritor availing himself of these options, he shall be bound to settle with the tenant as if the lease had naturally expired, No. 109. under deduction of damages, in the event of the possession being re-let by the heritor on less favourable terms. No. 10. The outgoing and incoming tenants must settle between themselves regarding the payment of crop, manure, and other things, without any responsibility on the heritor, unless the heritor choose to interfere. . . . All valuations or estimates to be by men mutually chosen, who shall have power to appoint an oversman to adjudicate upon the difference between them. . . .

Feb. 26, 1897.
Jaffray's
Trustee v.
Milne.

By the lease it was stipulated:—"With regard to houses, &c., the said James Jaffray binds himself to relieve the heritor of all claims of the outgoing tenant for meliorations, and, in particular, for" certain specified meliorations . . . "all as the same may be estimated by men to be mutually chosen. . . . And, at the expiry of this lease, the said James Jaffray shall be entitled to payment in like manner for the said meliorations as the same may then be valued. . . . And, if the mason work belonging to the heritor shall be deteriorated, the tenant must pay for the deterioration as the same be determined by valuation." There was also a provision prohibiting the tenant from removing the straw and dung.

On 19th July 1895 the landlord brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Peterhead against Jaffray for sequestration for a year's rent of £56, 10s., then current, for summary removing, and for payment of £215, 12s. 6d. sterling of arrears of rent.

On 6th August 1895 Jaffray granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors in favour of John Whyte, decorator, Aberdeen.

Thereafter by joint minute between the landlord, on the one part, and Jaffray and his trustee, on the other part, it was agreed that decree should pass in the landlord's favour for £197, 12s. 6d. as the amount of the arrears of rent, that the landlord should receive payment of the rent secured under the sequestration, and that no further proceedings should be taken in the sequestration. The landlord subsequently let the farm to another tenant.

On 28th August 1895 a meeting of Jaffray's creditors was held. The minute of meeting bore that there was present, inter alios, "Duguid R. Milne, advocate, for the proprietor," and further bore that "a statement of the bankrupt's affairs was submitted to the meeting along with the trust-deed, and the same having been considered along with the valuation of crops, &c., the meeting instructed the trustee to realise the estate, and divide the same amongst the creditors."

In November 1895 the landlord and the tenant's trustee entered into a reference as to the value of the meliorations on buildings, and the straw, dung, &c. on the farm (the crops having been reaped by the trustee). Under this reference £125, 4s. was fixed as the value of the meliorations on buildings, and £63, 17s. as the value of the straw, dung, &c.

The trustee having brought against the landlord an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen for payment of these sums, the landlord, founding on the decree in his favour for £197, 12s. 6d. of arrears of rent, pleaded—(5) This defender is entitled to set off against the sums sued for the sums due to him under the lease.

On 5th November 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) sustained this plea and assoilzied the defender.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The ultimate question in the case is a very simple one, and, in my opinion, is conclusively determined in the landlord's favour

 Jaffray's
 Trustee v.
 Milne.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—(1) It was settled that stipulations against the removal of dung, straw, &c., and obligations to hand them over to the landlord at a valuation, conferred no security or preference on the landlord as against the general creditors of the tenant; and a creditor who had executed a pouding was entitled to carry them off to the exclusion of the landlord.¹ Then the rights of the trustee under a trust for behoof of creditors were, quoad acceding creditors, the same as those of the trustee in a sequestration;² and the act and warrant of the trustee in a sequestration was equivalent to an executed pouding. It followed therefore that if the defender had acceded, the pursuer was quoad him in the position of a creditor holding an executed pouding, and was therefore vested with right to the dung, straw, &c., at least—but not, it might be admitted, to the value of the meliorations on heritable subjects—for behoof of the general creditors. There was therefore no concursum debiti et crediti between the defender's claim against Jaffray, the tenant, for the arrears of rent, and the pursuer's claim against the defender for the value of the dung, straw, &c. It was clear that the defender had acceded; the minute of 28th August made that plain. *Davidson's Trustees*³ relied on by the Sheriff-substitute, was not in point, because there the landlord had taken possession of the subjects of the stipulation before the tenant's bankruptcy, which was not the case here. (2) In any view, until the defender intimated his election himself to settle for the value of the meliorations on heritable subjects, dung, straw, &c., instead of leaving the settlement to the incoming tenant, there was no debt to be set off against the arrears of rent. The defender's obligation for the meliorations, dung, straw, &c., was consequently a novum debitum incurred by agreement with the pursuer, and such a debt could not be compensated by the defender's claim against Jaffray for the arrears of rent.⁴

Argued for the defender;—So far as the pursuer's claim was for the

"The agreement was between the landlord and the outgoing tenant to ascertain their respective rights and obligations under the lease, and was nothing more.

"The trustee was in possession of the estate, no doubt, but, before he entered on that, the lease had been irritated, and he expressly admits on record that his possession was solely for the purpose of winding up the bankrupt estate; there was no agreement within the meaning of Taylor's Trustee v. Paul, January 24, 1888, 15 R. 313—an authority on which the pursuer laid particular stress, and there could be none such, because there was no covenant of any kind under the lease between him and the incoming tenant or between the incoming tenant and the landlord. It was urged that the landlord was barred from maintaining his present position by his actings as instructed by the minute No. 10 of process, but I cannot gather that Mr Duguid Milne, who represented him, did anything more than concur in a direction to the trustee to realise the estate. . . ."

value of fixtures, his case was unarguable. Fixtures were the property of the landlord, subject to the tenant's right to remove if he fulfilled the prestations of the lease, including of course payment of the rent.¹ Quoad ultra there was a clear case for compensation; both the claim and the counter claim arose out of the contract of lease, and nothing else.

Jaffray's
Trustee v.
Milne.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is well founded, and for the reasons which he very clearly states. I should have contented myself with saying so had it not been that the appellant referred to two cases which apparently were not brought under the notice of the Sheriff-substitute, and which were said to be contrary to the judgment which has been pronounced. These were the cases of *Stewart*² and Dun.³ In my opinion these cases are in no respect adverse to the judgment we are considering. It is a remark applicable to both of them, that no question was decided as to the right of the landlord to compensate or set off the arrears of rent due to him under the lease against sums due by him to his tenant for meliorations, or crop or dung left on the farm at the end of the lease. There was no question between landlord and tenant, or debtor and creditor, at all. The questions were between the landlord maintaining rights under the lease against creditors of the tenant, who had made their rights effectual against the tenant's estate by diligence. In the circumstances existing in these cases the creditors' diligence was held to prevail against the landlord's claim. There is no such question here. The parties are the landlord and tenant, or the tenant's trustee under a voluntary trust, which is the same thing in effect. Between these two parties there are mutual claims equally liquid, and arising out of the same contract. That being so, I can see no ground for refusing the landlord his right to plead compensation as he does. I think the appeal should be refused.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion, and have little to add. The pursuer's claim against the landlord in respect of meliorations presents no difficulty, because the subjects on which they are said to have been made are partes soli, the fixed property of the landlord, and the bankrupt's claim can only be made good through the lease. The case is therefore ruled by Smith v. Harrison.¹

As regards the dung, straw, &c., the question is more difficult, because they are just the personal property of the tenant, over which the landlord has no security for his rent. A poinding creditor could have attached them—*Stewart*² and *Dun*³—and perhaps if sequestration had taken place the trustee, in virtue of his act and warrant, would have been in as good a position as a poinding creditor. On this, however, it is not necessary to express an opinion, because here there was only a voluntary trust for creditors, and I do not think it is satisfactorily established that the landlord acceded to it. If so, the trustee, the pursuer, is in no better position than the bankrupt, and the landlord is entitled to set off his counter claim.

Magistrates of
Newton-on-Ayr.

MAGISTRATES OF NEWTON-ON-AYR, Defenders (Reclaimers).—C. J. Guthrie—Hunter.

Church—Stipend—Competent and legal stipend—Amount.—The magistrates, councillors, and freemen of a burgh were bound by decree of disjunction and erection of a parish to provide the minister serving the cure with a legal and competent stipend, in addition to a manse, cow's grass, and allowance for Communion expenses. In an action by the minister the Court (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling), having regard to the number of the population, the duties entailed on the minister by the character of the parish, and the emoluments of neighbouring charges, fixed £300 as the amount of the stipend to be provided by the magistrates, councillors, and freemen.

Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

(ANTE, vol. 22, p. 633.)

This was an action at the instance of the Reverend William Rainie, minister of the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, against the Magistrates, Councillors, and Freemen of the burgh of Newton-on-Ayr, and also against the Presbytery of Ayr for any interest they might have, concluding (1) for declarator that the defenders were bound to provide the pursuer, as minister of the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, with a competent and legal stipend suited to the circumstances of the time and position and duties of the benefice, and (2) for payment to the pursuer of £400 for each year, from Whitsunday 1892 to Whitsunday 1894, and for £400 a year thereafter "as a competent and legal stipend, . . . or of such other sum, less or more, as in the circumstances shall appear to our said Lords to be a competent and legal stipend, during the lifetime of the pursuer and his serving the cure."

Down to the year 1779 the parish of Newton-on-Ayr had formed part of the parish of Monkton and Prestwick, but in that year it was disjoined and erected into a separate parish by decree of the Lords Commissioners of Teinds. The decree provided, inter alia, that the magistrates, council, and freemen of the burgh should be bound to provide the minister with a competent and legal stipend not under £60 yearly, as also to pay him the rent of a house until a house should be built proper for his accommodation, which should be done as soon as convenient, and likewise to give him the liberty of a cow's grass to be herded with the town's cows on the common belonging to the community, and in like manner to furnish him with Communion elements, and an allowance for Communion expenses.

The pursuer was inducted to the charge of the church and parish in July 1881, and down to Whitsunday 1892 he received, in addition to the stipend of £60, a sum varying from £80 to £100 by way of gratuity, but the magistrates and council refused thereafter to pay him more than £60, with the result that he raised this action in No. 110. 1894.

On 9th January 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) found ^{Feb. 26, 1897.} "that on a just construction of the decree of disjunction and erection ^{Rainie v. Magistrates of Newton-on-Ayr.} the defenders were bound to provide the pursuer and his successors in office with a competent and legal stipend suited to the circumstances of the time, and the position and duties of the benefice, and therefore" decerned in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and appointed the cause to be enrolled that parties might be heard on the petitory conclusions. The defenders having reclaimed against this interlocutor, the First Division adhered on 6th June 1895.

Thereafter the pursuer lodged a minute containing a statement of the facts and circumstances on which he relied in support of his claim for a stipend of £400 per annum, and answers were lodged by the defenders.

The pursuer's minute contained statements to the following effect:—Present Stipend and Emoluments.—From 1882 to 1891 the annual payments received by the pursuer from every source (excluding the annual value of the manse) amounted on the average to £297, 3s. 10d. Since 1892 the average had fallen to £200, 4s. 10d. These payments included an Exchequer grant of £90, allowance for Communion elements, £8; cow's grass, £5; cowfauld's bond (representing the price of a part of the glebe which had been sold), £9, 10s.; glebe rent, £7; and Wood Bequest, about £18. The annual value of the manse, estimated at £36, and the allowances for Communion elements and cow's grass, should not be taken into account in fixing the amount of the stipend to be provided by the defenders, for under the decree of disjunction the burden of providing the minister with a manse, cow's grass, and an allowance for Communion elements, was separate from that of providing a competent stipend. The Wood Bequest Fund was settled by William Wood in 1876. By the terms of the settlement the income was to be paid to the minister of Newton-on-Ayr, to be applied by him "to his own uses and purposes, and that in addition to any sums that may have been or may hereafter be secured to him by way of stipend or otherwise."

Character of Parish.—The parish lay entirely within the parliamentary burgh of Ayr. In 1779 the population did not exceed 1600. In 1881 it had risen to 6511, and in 1891 to 8564. The population was mostly working class, with a considerable number of poor, and it fluctuated considerably, thus increasing the labours of the minister. The membership of the church at the last revision of the communion roll in 1895 amounted to 919. The pursuer's duties comprised two services every Sunday, the charge of a Sunday school attended by over 400 scholars, the conduct of two Bible classes, senior and junior, of which the former continued for the six winter months, and the latter for ten months in the year, the usual classes for intending communicants for four weeks twice a year previous to the half-yearly Communion. Besides his purely congregational work, a large amount of labour fell upon the pursuer as minister of the parish, such as visiting the sick and infirm, officiating at baptisms, marriages, and funerals, in families not connected with the congregation, and attending to the necessities of the poor. The average number of baptisms, marriages, and funerals, at which the pursuer officiated amounted respectively to 100, 36, and 54. These figures represented respectively 12, 20, and 10 per cent of the total number of baptisms, marriages, and funerals registered in the burgh and parish of Ayr, and as there were twenty churches belonging to different Christian denominations in the burgh of Ayr, it was obvious that a large proportion of these services in the burgh were performed by the pursuer. As nearly all the marriages, and a large proportion of the baptisms and funeral services, took place in private houses, the call on the pursuer's time was very considerable.

Comparison with other Parochial Benefices.—The pursuer gave particulars of a number of the other parishes in the presbytery of Ayr, with the object of shewing that his claim was reasonable.

Manse.—The glebe could not be feued without injuring the amenity of the manse.

The defenders' answers were to the following effect:—Present Stipend and Emoluments.—The gratuity was only withdrawn temporarily to meet the expense of repairing the manse. Taking into account the annual value of the manse, and the average amount of the gratuity, the average income of the pursuer from all sources was £323, 10s., which the defenders maintained to be more than a competent and legal stipend. All sums received by the minister, including the Exchequer grant, the value of the glebe, the proceeds of the cow-fauld's bond and Wood Bequest, the allowances for Communion elements and cow's grass, and the annual value of the manse, should be computed as part of the stipend which the defenders were under obligation to provide. Communion elements had always been supplied in addition to the allowance of £8. The cow's grass was originally furnished because there was no glebe, but a glebe having been provided the obligation to provide cow's grass was discharged.

Character of the Parish.—Although there were about 900 communicants on the roll of the pursuer's church, about one-third came from other parishes. In extent the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, which covered an area of 696 acres, was by far the smallest parish in the county, the next smallest being 3736 acres.

Comparison with other Parochial Benefices.—The defenders referred to the circumstances and emoluments of other charges in the Presbytery of Ayr in support of their case.

Manse.—The pursuer's glebe was valuable feuing ground, and if feued would yield a large revenue immediately.

On 6th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds that the pursuer, as minister serving the cure of the parish of Newton-on-Ayr, was and is entitled to receive from the defenders, the Magistrates, Councillors, and Freemen of the burgh of Newton-on-Ayr, for themselves, and as representing the whole body of the community of the said burgh, and their successors in office, stipend at the rate of £300 a year as a competent and legal stipend, from and after the term of Whitsunday 1894, so long as he shall serve the said cure, and that in addition to the Communion allowance, allowance for cow's grass, and interest payable under cowfauld's bond; and decerns and ordains the said defenders to make payment to the pursuer, as minister foresaid, of the sum of £300 sterling per annum, as a competent and legal stipend, and that at two terms in the year, Martinmas and Whitsunday, by equal portions, beginning the first half-yearly payment as at the term of Martinmas 1894, and so forth half-yearly and termly during the period of his serving the said cure. . . ."

* "OPINION.—I have carefully considered the circumstances of this benefice as set out in the minute and answers on which the arguments of counsel

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The sum fixed by the Lord Ordinary was more than a competent and legal stipend. The result of his decision was that the pursuer would receive emoluments annually amounting, if the annual value of the manse were included, to £383, while the burden laid upon the small community of defenders, who had no power to tax anyone to defray it, would be increased from £60 to £300. The Lord Ordinary's decision was not justified by a consideration either of the circumstances of the cure or of the emoluments of neighbouring charges. At all events, in fixing the amount of stipend to be provided by the defenders, the other emoluments of the benefice should be taken into account; at least the annual value of the glebe and the proceeds of the cowfauld's bond should, for the defenders were placed under no obligation by the decree of disjunction to furnish the pursuer with a glebe.¹

Argued for the pursuer ;—The discretion of the Lord Ordinary had been reasonably exercised, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and should not be interfered with. It was well settled that the value of the glebe could not be taken into account in fixing the amount of a minister's stipend.

LORD PRESIDENT.—At this stage of the case the question to determine is, what is a competent and legal stipend computed upon the footing that the minister is, as the decree bears, to have over and above it a house and a cow's grass and Communion elements. Now, that is a question to be determined with reference to the circumstances of the incumbency, and light, doubtless, is to be derived from similar or nearly similar cases, especially in the neighbourhood, and from what may be called the general payment in the profession. Now, the Lord Ordinary who has decided the case proceeded. In particular, I have had regard to the allowances made down to 1892, by a committee representing the defenders, in supplement of the regular stipend. These allowances were made in the knowledge that owing to the fixed stipend being only £60, the minister received a grant of £90 from Exchequer, which will now, of course, be discontinued, and that his average receipts from all sources for ten years prior to 1892 were thus brought up to close on £300 a year. I have accordingly taken that sum as a fair estimate of what his regular stipend ought to be, but he will also be entitled to receive from the defenders the Communion allowance and the allowance for cow's grass, which form separate obligations in the decree of erection, and likewise a sum of £9, 10s., arising from a sale of part of the glebe. The return from the glebe itself is small, and would hardly affect the result, even if, contrary to the practice of the Teind Court, it were taken into account in fixing the amount of a competent stipend. The income of the Wood Bequest cannot, of course, be taken into account as a means of diminishing the burden resting on the defenders (late Lord President in Kilmalcolm case, 3 R. 32).

"I was urged by the pursuer's counsel, on the precedent afforded by the case of Peters, to draw back the award to Whitsunday 1892, when the defenders first refused to make any allowance in supplement of the stipend. But in this case it seems to me inadmissible to go further back than the date of citation. Till then there was no judicial demand for an increase of the competent and legal stipend. The arrears in Peters' case were awarded not at the rate fixed by the Court for the future, but at a rate which the Court held the defenders had themselves liquidated as the proper amount of stipend for the time being. There was nothing of that kind here."

happens to have had considerable experience in determining, I will not say the same question, but the similar question which arises when augmentations are asked for in the Court of Teinds, and though he has specifically mentioned a set of considerations as to the previous practice in this parish which perhaps have less bearing, his primary proposition is that he has carefully considered the circumstances of this benefice as set out in the appendix containing the minute and answers. Now, the minute and answers carefully go over the whole range of considerations which seem to be relevant to the determination of this question. I shall only say that looking to the population of this place, to the duties which the local circumstances seem to give rise to, to the character of the population, and having regard also to the emoluments of neighbouring ministers, it seems to me that the Lord Ordinary's figure is a very fair one.

I should perhaps consider it legitimate in the present case to take into account the existence of the glebe. As I have already mentioned, the manse and the cow's grass are expressly declared in the decree to be over and above the stipend, and therefore they cannot be taken into account. But suppose you do take into account the fact that this benefice has the advantage of a glebe, that would not substantially displace the legitimacy of the Lord Ordinary's conclusion, and I say that having regard to the other and similar cases noted in the various papers. Doubtless this is a question which might strike different minds differently, but upon the whole I am satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's decision.

LORD ADAM.—So am I. I think the true question is, whether this is a competent and legal stipend, giving effect to the considerations your Lordship has mentioned. I think the most material considerations to look to are the circumstances of the benefice itself, and what is the sort of average stipend in the surrounding and neighbouring parishes. Looking at the statements here, I do not think that the sum fixed by the Lord Ordinary is anything else than a competent stipend.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Paisley by Patrick M'Carthy against John Emery for payment of £100 as damages for personal injury.

the Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) having heard parties' procurators No. 111. appointed the case to the roll of next Court for further procedure. On 19th January the Sheriff-substitute, "on the defender's motion," Feb. 27, 1897. because of the absence of the pursuer's agent, McCarthy v. Emery. continued the case to the roll of next Court. On 26th January the Sheriff-substitute, "in absence of the pursuer," assoilzied the defender, with expenses.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session and craved to be reponed.¹ He stated that the failure of the pursuer's agent to appear had been entirely owing to a misunderstanding.

The defender objected to the pursuer being reponed, and argued ;— The case had been repeatedly delayed on the pursuer's motion, and his agent had twice failed to appear at a diet of debate. He had been leniently treated, as the Sheriff might have pronounced decree of absolvitor on the first occasion on which no appearance was made for him.² Reponing was a matter in the discretion of the Court, and that discretion was only exercised on special cause shewn.³ None was shewn here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court consider that, upon payment of all the expenses of process up to the present date, this absolvitor may stand aside and the case be proceeded with. The proper form seems to be to recall the interlocutor hoc statu, and allow the pursuer, as a condition of further procedure, to make payment of the whole expenses of process. If he does that, we shall send the case to the Sheriff Court ; if he does not, we shall of new assoilzie and dismiss the appeal.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 26th January 1897, and allowed the pursuer, as a condition of being allowed to proceed with the cause, to make payment of the whole expenses of the defender in both Courts.

Johnston's
Executrices v.
Johnston.

Mr William Johnston died on 23d July 1867. His widow died on 3d May 1884.

In 1896 an action was raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, by Mrs Janet Johnston and Miss Margaret Johnston, as executrices-nominate of Mrs Marion Johnston, against John Johnston, concluding for payment of £402, 14s. 10d.

The pursuers averred that, by trust-disposition dated 12th January 1858, Mr William Johnston and his wife, as liferenters, and the defender, as fiar, of the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, conveyed these lands to trustees for, inter alia, the following purposes (1) to allow Mr William Johnston and his spouse, and the survivor of them, the liferent of the lands; and (2) after their death to allow the defender the alimentary liferent of the lands.

In June 1876 the then acting trustees let to John Johnston, the defender, the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds for seven years at the rent of £127, and the defender possessed the lands, under the lease and by tacit relocation, down to the date of Mrs Marion Johnston's death, but he failed to pay the rent.

The pursuers further averred that the rent, after deducting each year a sum of £50, to which the defender had been found entitled as equitable compensation,¹ which remained unpaid, amounted with interest to the sum sued for.

The pursuers produced an assignation by the trustees to the rents in question.

The defender stated, inter alia, that since the date of the termination of the lease he had been in possession of the lands as liferenter, that Mrs Marion Johnston had refused to take proceedings against him for the alleged rent,* and that the pursuers had made no claim therefor until they had pleaded it in compensation of a claim made by the defender against them in an action in 1893.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The sums sued for are prescribed, and the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (2) In respect of mora the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (7) Pursuers or their mother having agreed to hold the sums sued for as discharged, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 9th December the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) sustained the defender's seventh plea in law, and assoilzied the defender.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The letter of 11th December 1878, on which the Sheriff based his judgment, was at most an indemnity to the trustees. It was not addressed to the defender, and

* The defender referred to and founded on a letter, dated 11th December 1878, from Mrs Marion Johnston to the trustees, in the following terms:—“With reference to the arrears of rent of Cardowan due by my son John Johnston, your co-trustee, and to the correspondence which has passed between your agents and mine on the subject, I hereby acknowledge that owing to his inability to make payment it is not my desire to have same enforced, and I oblige myself, and my heirs, executors, and successors, to hold you skaitless (1) in respect of your not enforcing payment by action of said arrears; and (2) in respect of your not enforcing payment of the rents yet to become due by my said son, so long as I do not instruct you to enforce payment of the same.—In witness whereof, &c.” The letter was tested but not stamped.

was in no sense a discharge in his favour. The quinquennial prescription did not apply. The terminus a quo the five years commenced to run was the tenant's removal from the lands, not the termination of the lease.¹ The tenant here had not removed from the lands. Accordingly, the letter of the Act did not fit his case. Nor did the ratio, which was to protect tenants against the hazard of losing their discharges when removing from the lands.

No. 112.
Mar. 3, 1897.
Johnston's
Executrices v.
Johnston.

The respondent argued;—Even though the letter did not amount to an express discharge the defender was entitled to found on it as instructing an abandonment of the claim.² Many years had elapsed since the rent in question became payable, and the pursuers were barred by mora. The Act 1669, c. 9, applied. The defender, no doubt, was still in the occupation of the lands, but he had ceased to be tenant. It was not the physical personal removal of the tenant, but the termination of his occupancy qua tenant—when rent ceased to be exigible from him—that marked the period from which the years of prescription were to run. The cases cited by the pursuers were not in point. In *Murray*¹ the defender never was a tenant in the sense of the Act 1669. In *Strahorn*¹ the defender had not ceased to be a tenant, although he had come to have a new landlord.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have two questions at least to consider.

The first is whether this claim, being one for rent, is struck at by the Act 1669, c. 9. Now, the terms of that Act, so far as it applies to claims of rent, are these:—"And likewise malls and duties of tennents not being pursued within five years after the tennents shall remove from the lands for which the malls and duties are craved shall prescribe in all time coming." This statute, of course, has the effect of cutting off what would otherwise be a good and legal claim. That being so, it seems to me that it is not legitimate to extend its terms beyond the case to which it is expressly applied. Now, it postulates the case of a tenant having removed from lands. What is the case of the defender in this action? He has not removed from the lands; on the contrary, he has stayed on them. It is quite true that he has lost the character of tenant, and stays on in the higher quality of proprietor, but the fact that he has acquired that higher right, and parted with the lower, does not bring about the event which is described in the statute, and that is, his removal from the lands. It appears to me that those words are so clear that they cannot be applied to a case where the tenant does not remove from the lands, but, on the contrary, ceasing to be a tenant, stays on the lands. On that ground I think we are in a position now to repel the plea, because technically put there is no case of removal from the lands stated on record; on the contrary, it appears from the record that there is a case of staying on the lands.

The second question is whether the Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment can stand; and I am of opinion that it cannot. The Sheriff-substitute, dealing with a case, which, as stated on record, is a case of abandonment by the creditor in a claim for rent, has picked out of the productions a letter addressed not to the debtor but to the trustees of the creditor, in which she says that she binds herself to keep them skaitless from any claim arising from their not demanding the rent. I do not think that it is possible to treat that as a writ instructing a discharge of this claim. It may have a place in the case, once the facts are ascertained, and may support or corroborate the other averments made by the defender. But it seems to me—and indeed I think it was only faintly argued to the contrary—that the Sheriff-substitute has been premature in treating this as a conclusive ground of judgment.

What I have said leads to the first plea being repelled. As regards the second plea, I should like to make this remark. Scientifically speaking, I do not think it is supported by any averment, and I should be inclined to go further and say that the plea is bad in itself. But at the same time I think it would be safer not, hoc statu, to repel it, because that might be misconstrued into meaning that the element of delay should be eliminated from the consideration of the Judge in the Court below, to which I propose that the case should revert. Therefore it is perhaps more expedient not now formally to repel the plea, and the considerations which it is intended to embody may have their legitimate weight in combination with the other facts of the case.

LORD ADAM.—The first question in the rent case is whether the quinquennial prescription provided by the 1669 Act applies. I agree that it does not, because the point of time specified by the Act for the prescription beginning to run is the date when the tenant removes from the land.

I think that to bring a case under the Act, a defender must aver that he is a tenant who has de facto removed from the land, and that five years have elapsed since then. There is no such averment on record here, but the tenant is still on the land. It is true that the character in which he is there is different, because formerly he held as a tenant and now he does so as proprietor; but that is not the question under the Act, which is, whether or not in fact the tenant has removed. As he has not done so, I am of opinion that the Act has no application. I may observe that it appears from the arguments urged in all cases on this point that one of the reasons for this rule was the liability of a removing tenant to lose his documents of debt after his removal, which consideration does not apply to a tenant who never has removed; but this is not material, since the question of fact in the Act is quite clear.

As regards the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, it was somewhat faintly supported, but it was suggested that the letter was a link in a chain of circumstances; but if this be so, what are the circumstances, and when were they proved?

In point of fact they are neither admitted nor proved, and accordingly I agree with your Lordships that there is no apparent foundation for the summary dismissal of the action. As to the remaining pleas, I think the plea of mora might have been dismissed had we been dealing strictly with the case. As I understand, prescription depends merely on the efflux of time, but mora not merely on this, which would make it equivalent to prescription; but the party founding on mora must shew that his position was prejudiced by the delay. But I should have been unwilling to repel the plea, because, while it was admitted by Mr Thomson that he was not prejudiced by the delay, it may become an important element hereafter in connection with the subsequent proceedings in the case. No. 112.

 Ferris v.
 Cowdenbeath
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

The pursuer having appealed for jury trial, the cause was tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury on 18th December 1896.

The evidence was to the following effect:—At the time of the accident the pursuer was employed by the defenders as an oncost man at one of their pits, and had been ordered by Laird, a foreman and roadsman in the employment of the defenders, to clear a wheel-brae in the pit, on which hutches were worked by means of an endless chain. This wheel-brae was about 200 yards long, and at the side of the incline were manholes as required by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. The men got notice of the approach of hutches by the movement of the chain. In order to escape certain hutches which were approaching, the pursuer went to the nearest manhole, but finding it obstructed by rubbish, he did not enter, and was knocked down and injured by the hutches. There was a conflict of evidence as to the amount of rubbish in this manhole: the pursuer and another workman gave it as about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a ton, other workmen stated it at less. There was evidence to the effect that the rubbish had been put there by orders of Laird some days before. The manhole in its normal condition was about 4 feet 10 inches in height and 5 feet broad. Laird was dead at the date of the trial. Cochrane, the underground manager, gave this evidence:—“Laird and I responsible for state of brae. When I was not there, Laird responsible. The men had to obey his instructions. If I had seen the stuff, I would have ordered it to be removed. It was a breach of the rules. . . . I cannot account for four men taking a day to clear the road and manholes after the accident. Laird wrong in having stuff there.”

The jury returned a unanimous verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £50.

The defenders moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted.

Argued for the defenders;—There was here no defect in “the condition of the ways.” The word “condition” must be supposed to have some significance; “defect in the ways” was something different from “defect in the condition of the ways.” The former included defects whether temporary or permanent; the latter was confined to defects of a permanent character—defects of construction.¹ Here there was nothing more than a temporary obstruction, and further, a manhole was not part of the ways.

The Court intimated that they would take time to consider as to calling on the pursuer.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer's case before the jury was, that having been instructed to clear a wheel-brae, he, on the approach of a train of trucks or hutches, did what it was his duty to do in ordinary circumstances, viz., to make for the nearest manhole, which is a recess at the side of the road intended as a place of safety when a train of trucks is passing. The nearest manhole that he came upon was one obstructed by stuff which had been placed on the bottom of it, and finding it in this condition he did not attempt to enter it. Whether there was enough of stuff in the manhole to prevent him from getting in or not, is not, I think, of very much consequence, because in the dim light, if he found the manhole obstructed, it was quite natural for him to think that it was not safe for him to make the attempt, and to consider some other expedient. Therefore, I do not think any blame attaches to him in what he did in that state of matters.

Ferris v.
Cowdenbent
Coal Co.,
Limited.

The owners of the pit had constructed a good road and made manholes, and there is therefore no objection to the way in which the road was constructed—the condition of the roadway when it was constructed was satisfactory, the owners having done all that was necessary to be done. The question comes to be, whether a certain interference with that roadway took place in such a way, or whether the roadway was allowed to remain in such a condition, that the jury were justified in finding that the pursuer was entitled to a verdict.

Now, there is a great deal of conflicting evidence upon that subject—conflicting evidence as to the quantity of stuff that had been thrown into this manhole; and I think it is quite plain, and the impression I formed at the time was, that there was a good deal of exaggeration on the part of several of the witnesses in regard to that matter, but there is no doubt that before this accident happened a quantity of stuff had been put on the bottom of one of the manholes. Unless it was done by some person in a position of authority, however, the mere fact would not make the master responsible, because it was not an interference with the condition of any of the ways due to the master, and if done by some person for whom he was not responsible at the time at which it was done, there could not be any blame attached to the master. But it is quite plain that if such a state of matters was allowed to continue in the knowledge of the master, or was allowed to continue by someone for whom the master was responsible under the Act of Parliament, then it might become a defective condition of the way, because if it was left in that state it practically resulted in this, that instead of a manhole of sufficient height with the floor level with the rails being there, the manhole was not level with the rails, and was not of sufficient height.

Now, whatever impression I might form myself upon the evidence upon that matter, having seen and heard the witnesses, the real question is, whether the jury, upon the evidence which they had before them, rightly came to the conclusion that this state of matters was allowed to continue by the person who was responsible to see that the ways and plant and all these matters connected with the pit were in proper order—that it was allowed to remain by him so as to constitute a condition of the ways for which the master would be responsible. Having considered the notes of evidence, I have come to the conclusion that we have no grounds for holding that the jury were not justified, if they considered that to be the sound view of the evidence, in coming to that conclusion. There are one or two points in the evidence which are pretty strong in that direction. One is that the manager of the pit himself admits that such a state of things was wrong. He cannot

No. 113. account for the work of clearing it out afterwards taking the time it did, if it was only transferring a small quantity of stuff that was upon the floor of that manhole, and therefore there presumably was a considerable quantity of stuff; and if there was a considerable quantity of stuff, then it must have been, or ought to have been, seen by the roadsman, who was the person responsible by Act of Parliament for seeing that the ways were kept in proper order.

Ferris v.
Cowdenbeath
Coal Co.,
Limited.

Therefore, as I think there was material evidence here upon which the jury might return the verdict complained of, I have come to the conclusion that a new trial ought not to be granted.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree.

LORD TRAYNER.—The case presented to us as the ground on which a new trial ought to be granted is, as I understand, rather a question of law than a question of fact. I understood Mr Salvesen to argue to us that there could be no liability here, because in the proper legal sense there was no defect in the ways in this pit in respect of which the master should be made liable to the pursuer in the damages claimed. Now, the pursuer's right is based on the Employers Liability Act, which provides that a master shall be liable for damage done to his servant from any defect in the condition of the ways. But then it qualifies that by saying that the master shall not be liable unless the defect arose, or had not been discovered or remedied, owing to the negligence of the master, or some person in his employment to whom he had entrusted the duty of seeing that the ways were in proper condition. It was said that in this case the way—the underground plane—by which the workmen travelled was in itself complete; that there was no defect; and I do not think that that is disputed. There could not therefore be any liability for damages on that account under the section of the Act to which I have just referred. But the Mines Regulation Act prescribes that not only shall there be a free unencumbered way along which the men may travel, but that in all these ways there shall be what are called manholes into which persons travelling along can find a safe resort in the event of hutches passing along the way by which they are travelling. These manholes are as essentially part of the way as the plane on which the traveller walks. Therefore if there was any defect in the manholes, there was a defect in the way which the employer is required to keep clear and in good condition. The evidence shews that the manhole to which the pursuer resorted when he was in danger was filled with rubbish—I do not mean absolutely full, but to some extent filled with rubbish which certainly should not have been there, because the statutory requirement is, that these manholes or places of refuge shall always be kept clear. There is a positive enactment to the effect that "Every manhole and every place of refuge shall be constantly kept clear, and no person shall place anything in any such manhole or place of refuge." Now, that statutory obligation on the part of the masters was disregarded, and they will be responsible for that under section 1 of the Employers Liability Act, unless it can be shewn that they fall within the exception of subsection 1 of section 2, which I have referred to. It appears from the proof upon this matter that the duty of keeping the ways clear was entrusted to a man named Laird, and I think there is evidence to shew that Laird neglected his duty, and that it was in consequence of that neglect on his part to keep clear these manholes that the accident occurred. That being so, I have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that there was, both in law and in fact, good ground here for the verdict, and therefore, like your Lordship, I am not disposed to grant a new trial.

LORD YOUNG.—I wish to say that I concur with what Lord Trayner has said as to the law of the matter. I think that the master is liable in law and in fact.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion as the rest of your Lordships. I think the manhole was part of the ways, and that it was so obstructed as not to be able to be used, and that that was a defect in the ways. I think there was evidence to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that this manhole was obstructed, not in a casual or temporary manner, but in such a manner as to prevent the pursuer, the man who was injured, from taking refuge in it, and that that was due to the fault of the person Laird who was entrusted with seeing that the ways were in a proper condition.

In these circumstances I think the verdict should be sustained.

Succession—Testament—"Issue."—Held that a destination to a person's "issue" in the ordinary case includes not children only but direct descendants of every degree, per stirpes.

A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his children in liferent and "of the respective issue of my said children" in fee, and with a destination over in favour of the surviving children in the event of any child dying without leaving issue.

Held that a child of the testator who died leaving grandchildren but no children had not died without leaving issue in the sense of the deed.

JAMES TURNER died on 2d April 1861, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes.

1st DIVISION.

The residuary purpose was as follows:—"I direct my said trustees to hold the residue and remainder of my means and estate in equal proportions, share and share alike, for behoof of the children already born or who may yet be born to me (exclusive always of the foresaid James Turner, whom I hereby debar from any share or interest in said residue), and the survivors and survivor of them, but in liferent only for their respective liferent use thereof allanarly, and for behoof of the respective issue of my said children per stirpes in fee: But I hereby provide and declare that in the event of any of my said children predeceasing me (excluding always the foresaid James Turner) leaving issue of his or her body, such issue, if surviving at the time of my death, shall succeed to the share of said residue which would have fallen to the parent in liferent and his or her issue in fee had such parent survived me; and in the event of the death of any of my said children, whether the same shall happen before or after my own death, without leaving issue, the share of such deceasing child or children shall go and belong in equal proportions to my surviving children, excluding always the said James Turner, the families of a deceased child or children representing the parent and succeeding to the share that would have fallen to such parent if in life."

The testator was survived by several children. One of these, William Turner, died in 1895, leaving no children, but survived by three grandchildren, Mrs Mc'Connell and Mrs Russell, the children of his daughter Isabella, and Catherine Turner, the only child of his son James.

The question then arose, whether these grandchildren of William Turner were entitled to his share.

A special case was presented, in which the foregoing facts were narrated:—

The trustees of the testator were the first parties; George Turner and Mrs Agnes Turner or Young, the testator's surviving children, the second and third parties; the children of Joseph Turner, a son of the testator who had died, fourth parties; and William Turner's grandchildren the fifth parties.

The following were the questions submitted to the Court:—

"(1) Does the income of the residue of the late James Turner's estate, so long as such residue remains in the hands of the trustees, fall to be divided equally between the second, third, and fourth parties per stirpes? Or (2) Does it fall to be divided equally between the second, third, fourth, and fifth parties per stirpes? (3) Have the fifth parties now a vested right in the fee of the share of residue of which their grandfather, William Turner, possessed the liferent?"

Argued for the first, second, third, and fourth parties;—The question came to be this, were William's grandchildren "issue" of William? The word issue had no technical meaning in the law of Scotland as in England,¹ but in a popular sense it was exclusive of grandchildren.² The case of *Macdonald v. Hall*³ was concerned with a marriage-contract, and it was held that grandchildren were within the contemplation of the marriage-contract, and not strangers to it. The use of the word "families" shewed that issue must be restricted to children.

The fifth parties argued;—"Issue" in ordinary popular phraseology included direct descendants of every degree. *Young's*² case so far as it was an authority to the contrary had been overruled by Macdonald v. Hall.³ The use of the word families was quite in accord with the ordinary meaning of issue.⁴

No. 114.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case is whether certain great-grandchildren of the testator are entitled to share with his grandchildren per stirpes in the residue of his estate. By his trust-disposition and settlement the deceased James Turner directed his trustees—[His Lordship quoted the residuary clause].

Mar. 4, 1897.
Turner's
Trustees v.
Turner.

The testator died on the 2d April 1861 survived by seven children, six of whom were entitled to participate in the liferent of the residue. Of these the second and third parties, George Turner, and Mrs Young, are the only survivors. The others died without issue, except Joseph, who died on the 24th of January 1867 leaving five children, who are the fourth parties to this case, and William, who died on the 1st July 1895 predeceased by two children, Mrs Wylie and James Turner, the former of whom left two children and the latter one child. These three grandchildren of William Turner are the fifth parties, and the question is whether they are entitled to participate in the residue. This may be stated in two forms, whether the testator's great-grandchildren can take under the gift in favour of the respective issue of his children, and whether the gift over in the event of the death of any of the children without leaving issue takes effect in a case where the child has left grandchildren by children who had died before him. In either form the question seems to me to be one and the same, and to depend on the construction which ought to be given to the word issue. It was decided in Young's Trustees v. M'Nab,¹ that in the law of Scotland the term issue has no technical meaning. The Lord President says,—“I think ‘issue’ and ‘lawful issue’ are merely words of popular signification, and that we must take them to mean just what we can gather to be the meaning intended to be attached to them by the testator so far as we can apprehend it in the ordinary way by examining the whole terms of his settlement.” Now, if the term is not technical, the general rule for construing the will is that stated by Lord Blackburn in the Caledonian Railway Company v. The North British Railway Company.² “There is not much doubt about the general principle. Lord Wensleydale used to enunciate (I have heard him many and many a time), that which he called the golden rule for construing written instruments. I find that he stated it very clearly and accurately in Grey v. Pearson,³ in the following terms:—‘I have been long and deeply impressed with the wisdom of the rule now I believe universally adopted, at least in the Courts of law in Westminster Hall, that in construing wills, and indeed statutes, and all written instruments, the grammatical and ordinary sense of words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity, or some repugnancy, or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified so as to avoid that absurdity or inconsistency, but no further.’” Now, it appears to me that in the ordinary sense the word issue includes direct descendants of every degree, and therefore that a gift to the issue of the testator's children will take effect in favour of their grandchildren, and that a gift over in the event of a child leaving no issue will not take effect if the child dies leaving grandchildren, although their parents, his immediate children, have died before the succession opens.

The question is this, whether, according to the ordinary use of language, a man who has died leaving grandchildren surviving him can be said to have died without issue. I think not, and that would be enough for the decision, were it not for the difficulty which arises from the observations of Lord Shand in the case of Young's Trustees v. M'Nab,¹ where his Lordship quotes as decisive the opinion of Lord Justice James in the case of Ralph v. Carrick.² "The word issue is an ambiguous word. In the ordinary parlance of laymen, it means children, and only children. When you talk of what issue a man has, or what issue there has been of a marriage, you mean children, not grandchildren or great-grandchildren. But in the language of lawyers, and only in that language, it means descendants." His Lordship therefore holds that the word has a technical meaning in the law of England which is different from its ordinary meaning, and in this view we should be bound in construing a Scotch will to give the word a different meaning from that which it would bear in an English will, inasmuch as we must hold that it has no technical meaning in the law of Scotland. In construing words of ordinary language, I should be disposed to defer to the authority of an English Judge of the eminence of Lord Justice James. But his Lordship's construction does not appear to me to be altogether in accordance with other authorities. It is not consistent with the definition of Dr Johnson, which is of the highest authority upon a question as to the ordinary meaning of English words. And what is more important, it appears to me to be inconsistent with the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Macdonald v. Hall,³ where it was held that a conveyance to the issue of children of a marriage conferred a protected right of succession on a grandchild. The Lord Chancellor quotes the following passage from Erskine:—"The father lies under no degree of restraint in favour of the substitutes who are called by the marriage-contract after the issue of the marriage, and who acquire no right by such substitution." And he adds,— "Now, it seems to me that in the natural meaning of the words 'issue of the marriage,' the grandchildren are included as much as the children. I do not accede to the argument that the primary meaning of 'issue' is children only, and that it is departing from the primary meaning if in 'issue of the marriage' you include the children of children." I do not understand his Lordship in this passage to be giving the technical meaning of the word in English law. He is construing the language of a Scotch institutional writer for the purpose of ascertaining the true meaning of a Scotch marriage-contract. I think his Lordship's construction is binding upon us, and that we are therefore relieved of the difficulty which might otherwise have been created by the opinions to which I have referred in *Young's Trustees v. M'Nab*¹ and in Ralph v. Carrick.²

Now, if the word "issue" in its primary meaning includes the children of children, and not the immediate children only, I think there is nothing in the context which requires us to depart from the ordinary meaning and to give the word a more restricted signification. No. 114.

On the contrary, if we are to gather the meaning which the testator intended to attach to his language by examining the whole terms of his settlement, we should in my opinion be forcing upon the words a meaning for which there is no justification if we were to hold that in the event which has happened he intended to cut out the grandchildren of his son William from all share in the succession. Mar. 4, 1897. Turner's Trustees v. Turner.

I am therefore of opinion that we should answer the first question in the negative and the second and third questions in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have endeavoured to keep an open mind to the arguments which have been addressed to us in favour of the more limited construction of the word "issue," especially when I find a difference of opinion existing amongst Judges of high authority as to the meaning of the word in ordinary parlance. I must candidly admit that I had formed an opinion before hearing the argument, an opinion, however, which I was quite prepared to abandon if convinced. There are some points on which a Judge must have a formed opinion, e.g., as to whether a destination to "issue" or "heirs of body" would carry estate to collaterals. This being premised, it is natural to go on and consider whether "issue" applies to other descendants than children. Accordingly, in a work published by me as a private individual¹ for the guidance of practitioners, I expressed an opinion—and it has been confirmed by the very satisfactory discussion which we have heard—in accordance with the judgment proposed by Lord Kinnear. I have only to mention, in addition to the cases referred to by his Lordship, a case of historical interest, viz., that in the Act settling the Crown upon William and Mary and their royal successors, the expressions "issue" and "heirs of the body" are used interchangeably, so as to convey the impression that they are words of identical meaning. In the different branches of succession the crown is settled on an individual and the "heirs of his body," and then the Act goes on to say that on the failure of "issue" the other branch is to come in. This may be good authority for the technical meaning given to the word by Lord Justice James, but I think it is also good authority for the ordinary meaning, because the question determined by the Act is one interesting all the subjects of the empire, and the Act is not to be regarded as a purely English Act of Parliament.

I agree with Lord Kinnear that if it is determined that "issue" comprehends descendants of all degrees, the answers to be given to the questions in the case present no difficulty.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Slander—Veritas—Counter Issue.—In an action of damages by an insurance company for slander, in respect of statements alleged to be contained in a speech delivered by the defender, the pursuers obtained an issue "whether the said statements falsely and calumniously represent that the accounts issued by the pursuers had been falsified, and that their financial position was at the date of the speech unsound." The defender pleaded veritas, and proposed as counter issues—" (1) Whether the pursuers knowingly deposited with the Board of Trade accounts and valuations which were calculated and intended to mislead the public? (2) Whether the pursuers' financial position is unsound?"

The Court disallowed the counter issues, on the ground that they did not meet the pursuers' issue.

Process—Jury Trial—Motion for postponement of Trial.—Circumstances in which the Court refused a motion for the postponement of a jury trial.

1ST DIVISION. ON 18th May 1896 the British Workman's and General Assurance Company, Limited, Birmingham, raised an action against James Stewart, managing treasurer of the City of Glasgow Friendly Society, 6 and 8 Richmond Street, Glasgow, for £2000 as damages for slander.

The pursuers alleged that they and the City of Glasgow Society were competitors in business, and in 1895 that society, in pursuance of a scheme for filching away the pursuers' business and transferring it to themselves, had published and circulated in various towns in Scotland an injurious circular, and had also, through its agents, circulated verbally slanderous statements to policy-holders and others regarding the pursuers, and that the proceedings were instigated by the defender.

Cond. 4. "On 7th March 1896 a meeting of members of said society resident in Kilsyth and neighbourhood was held in the New Masons' Lodge, Market Place, Kilsyth. This meeting was addressed by the defender, who, after giving statistics as to his own society, went on to attack pursuers in the following terms:—'Personally, I am satisfied that if the rival institutions which are represented in your town were subjected to the severe test which, of our own accord, we determined should be applied to the City of Glasgow Friendly Society, the majority would shew as large if not a larger sum as deficiencies than we show as surpluses. I fear that with many of these institutions the determination arrived at before the work of valuation is fairly begun is that by hook or crook a surplus must be brought out. Such a result may have on the surface a satisfactory look, but if the methods are known by which the surplus is obtained, would the public feel satisfied in putting their trust in such offices? Better far to have a deficiency wrought out on honest lines than a surplus obtained by calculations which no actuary worthy of the name would justify. I have heard that rather peculiar means were resorted to by one of these institutions to obtain a surplus and so to quiet the poor policy-holder. The actuary of the British Workman Company in a circular states that, by special resolution of the directors, he was authorised to make a valuation assuming the rate of interest at 3½ per cent, but the results of this valuation were of so unpleasing a character that the manager instructed the valuer to take the 4 per cent tables. After doing so, a deficiency of £69,360 was shewn.

Thereafter the directors decided to deposit accounts with the Board of Trade, setting forth a surplus of £21,577 instead of the actual deficiency of £69,360, and the valuer was instructed to prepare those accounts. The valuer, with commendable honesty, refused to have anything to do with the making up and publication of valuation accounts calculated to deceive anyone not acquainted with the subjects. The directors thereafter wrote their valuer that, as he had declined to act upon the instructions of the board, his services were no longer required. The public will not, I feel sure, consider that a valuation with a surplus obtained by the mere demand of the directors is worth the paper it is written on. It is to be hoped that few institutions are in such a pitiable plight as that to which I have just referred, but it must be admitted on the other hand that the City of Glasgow stands well in the fore-front in the matter of industrial insurance, and with the growing intelligence of the working-classes of the community I am sure that its superiority will be increasingly appreciated.' The said speech was delivered by defender in the presence and hearing of, inter alios, . . . The statements in said speech of and concerning the pursuers were false and calumnious. Said speech represents, and was intended to represent, that the accounts of pursuers had been deliberately and dishonestly falsified or manipulated, and that their financial position was at the date of the speech unsound. The said speech is of and concerning pursuers, and is false and calumnious, and is to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers in their legitimate business as an insurance company, and was maliciously made by the defender for the purpose of injuring the pursuers' business."

The pursuers also averred that a report of this speech had been inserted in the Kilsyth Chronicle of 14th March 1896 with the approval and authority, and at the instigation of the defender.

The defender, inter alia, pleaded;—Veritas.

After various procedure, the following issues were on 3d November 1896 adjusted in the Inner-House for the trial of the cause:—

"(1) Whether, on or about the 7th day of March 1896, at a meeting of members of the City of Glasgow Friendly Society, held in the New Masons' Lodge, Market Place, Kilsyth, the defender, in the presence and hearing of James Good, chairman, William Fyfe, secretary, Russell, one of the board of management, and A Breton, agent, all of said society, and of others, falsely and calumniously made the statements set forth in the first schedule appended hereto,* or statements of similar import and effect, of and concerning the pursuers, and whether the said statements falsely and calumniously represent that the accounts issued by the pursuers had been falsified, and that their financial position was at the date of the speech unsound, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers? Damages laid at £400. (2) Whether the defender caused a report containing the statements set forth in the first schedule appended hereto to be published in the issue of the Kilsyth Chronicle of 14th March 1896, and whether the said statements are of and concerning pursuers, and falsely and calumniously represent that the accounts issued by the pursuers had been falsified, and that their financial position was at the date of their publication unsound, to the loss, injury, and damage of pursuers? Damages laid at £400."

* The schedule referred to contained the speech quoted in cond. 4.

No. 115. The following counter issues were proposed by the defender :—“(1) Whether the pursuers knowingly deposited with the Board of Trade accounts and valuations which were calculated and intended to mislead the public? (2). Whether the pursuers’ financial position is unsound?”

On 19th January 1897 the pursuers objected to these counter issues, and argued ;—The charge of falsifying accounts was a serious one, and the counter issues did not come up to it.

Argued for the defenders ;—They were entitled to take a separate and material part of the averments, if it was separable, and justify it, and here they were dealing with the substantive part.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me to be perfectly impossible to grant these counter issues as they stand. The theory of them seems to be that as an answer to the first issue they would be entitled to prove as a separate proposition their first counter issue, and then try their hand at the second counter issue. Now, it is quite plain that at the very best they could only get counter issues of this kind if the two were consolidated,—that is to say, they would require to prove both the intention to mislead the public and also the fact of financial unsoundness before they could succeed. But it seems to me that the first counter issue does not come up to the issue to which it is opposed.

It has been said that there is authority for holding that a part of a libel may be justified, but that is quite a different question from what arises once the issues are adjusted for the pursuer, because nobody ever heard of a counter issue being lodged which only justified part of the issue to which it is an answer. I am for refusing the counter issues.

LORD M’LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I think the negative of the charge made in the principal issue would be that the company, knowing their financial position to be unsound, had represented that they were solvent. But it is not proposed that we should grant an issue in these terms.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the counter issues, and opened up the record ; allowed an amendment contained in a minute for the defenders, and allowed an answer for the pursuers to the amendment to be received.

On 5th February 1897 the Court allowed the pursuers to amend their record in terms of the answers lodged by them to the defenders’ minute of amendment, of new closed the record, and appointed the trial to take place on 5th March 1897.

On 19th February the pursuers moved the Court for a special jury. This motion was granted.

On 4th March the pursuers applied for a postponement of the trial.

The pursuers argued ;—The matter was one for the discretion of the Court, and there were grounds for that discretion being exercised in pursuers’ favour. The amendment which the defenders had been allowed to make challenged the pursuers’ financial position subsequent to the decennial examination of their accounts made in 1892, in accordance with the Board of Trade regulations. That involved an investigation into an enormous number of current policies, and the experts whose aid had been required had not been able to overtake the work. Further, the pursuers' manager was too ill to attend the trial, and he was an absolutely essential witness in an inquiry of this magnitude. No prejudice would be suffered by the defenders if the trial were postponed. On the other hand, the only alternative which the pursuers had was to abandon the action. It was unnecessary, and would be therefore unjust, to force them to do so.

The defenders argued;—The action having been raised in May 1896, there had been ample time for the pursuers—who must be taken to have known their own case—to prepare their evidence. Sibi imputent if they did not commence their preparations in time. There was no precedent for a trial being postponed in order to allow of expert evidence being obtained. The pursuers had waited until the defenders had put in their documents eight days before the trial, and it was too late after that to make the application. Further, it was not said that the manager was too ill to be examined, but only that he was too ill to attend the trial. He might be examined on commission. Delay would be most prejudicial, for there was a keen competition going on between the companies, and the action was being used as an instrument to damage the defenders.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This application has been made at a very late stage of the proceedings, and it is necessary to scrutinise carefully the grounds on which it is made. Now, the issues which ultimately determined what were the questions between the parties were adjusted and settled on 19th January 1897, and that allowed to the 5th March an interval of more than six weeks. The parties proceeded apparently in preparation for the trial on the issues so settled, and on the 19th February,—that is some time ago,—the pursuers, having apparently considered what the nature of the case was, proposed that a special jury should be summoned, and I should take that as evidence that they had seen the nature of the material which they were to place before the jury, and on that ground proposed a special jury. That, I think, is important, as shewing to the other party that the trial was to go on. Then there came next, and there passed, what in a case like this was a very critical stage, viz, the time (eight days before the trial) when documents had to be produced. The defenders duly tabled their states. Now, this is a case where manifestly, on the statement of the Dean of Faculty, a great deal might turn upon an examination of states and figures, and I own to a very strong reluctance to postpone the trial—a trial of this nature—when the pursuers of the action having taken their precautionary measures for having a proper trial allow the defenders to put in what is really a sketch of their case. The pursuers now apparently take fright at the defenders' case, and consider that they have underestimated the difficulties of their own case. Now, I think it would be barely fair to the defenders, after the pursuers have drawn their hand as it were, now to give them some indefinite delay for the purpose of building up the case, which I think ought to have been prepared long ago, and therefore I feel constrained to say that an insufficient case has been made for this application. It really comes to no more than this, that the pursuers having originally appreci-

No. 115. stated the nature of their case, and the time it would take to prepare, now that they see the defenders' case more fully developed, think better of it. I cannot say that I think the question is of very great importance, for this reason, that the alternative is between postponing the trial and abandonment, but, at the same time, I think that we are bound to regard the duties of litigants in relation to one another at the various stages of a jury trial, and for my part I cannot bring myself to think that sufficient ground has been given under the first head of the application.

As regards the second, the Dean of Faculty was very frank in saying that it was of subsidiary importance in their view, and I do not think it would have afforded adequate ground for this application if it had stood by itself. It does not fit in with any precision as affording any corroboration of the first ground.

On the whole matter, I think the motion should be refused.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the motion.

Corporation of City or Glasgow.

Lease—Relief—Public Burdens—Tramway—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), sec. 6.—By a contract bearing to be a "lease" the Corporation of Glasgow "let" to a tramway company the sole right to use carriages with flange wheels on the whole tramways authorised to be formed by the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, for the space of twenty-three years, on condition (1) that the company should pay interest on the sum expended by the Corporation in making the tramways and certain other annual payments during the lease; and (2) that the company should pay to the Corporation "the expense of borrowing, management, &c. [sic], and this provision shall be so construed as to keep the Corporation free from all expenses whatever in connection with the said tramways."

As the lease extended beyond twenty-one years the company were entered in the Valuation-roll as owners of the tramways at their annual value, and assessed accordingly.

In defence to an action by the Tramway Company against the Corporation for relief of such part of the assessment as corresponded to the rent paid by the company, in terms of section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854, the defenders maintained (1) that the contract was not truly a lease, but merely a licence to use carriages with flanged wheels on certain streets; and (2) that assuming the contract to be a lease, the pursuers were, by the contract, bound to keep the defenders free of this expense.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) (1) that the contract was a lease of a heritable subject, and (2) that the obligation to free the Corporation of all expenses in connection with the tramways did not apply to assessments for which the Corporation was liable as owners of the tramways.

Lease—Relief—Public Burdens—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), sec. 6.—Section 6 of the Valuation Act of 1854 provides that if lands or heritages (other than minerals) are let upon a lease for a period of more than twenty-one years, the rent payable under such lease shall not necessarily be assessed as the annual value of such lands or heritages, but such yearly value shall be ascertained in terms of the Act irrespective of the amount of rent payable under the lease, and the lessee under such lease shall be deemed to be the proprietor in the sense of the Act, "but shall be entitled to relief from the actual proprietor thereof, and to deduction from the rent payable by him to such actual proprietor of such proportion of all assessments upon the valuations of such lands and heritages" as corresponds to the rent payable by such lessee to the actual proprietor.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the right of relief conferred by the section could be made effectual otherwise than by deduction from the rent, and that a tenant who had paid rent without deduction had a good claim against the proprietor for repayment of his proportion of rates and taxes.

Acquiescence—Mora—Landlord and Tenant—Public Burdens—Abandonment of claim of relief.—Tenants under a lease for a period of twenty-three years intimated to their landlord a claim to be relieved of the owner's proportion of rates and taxes. The landlord repudiated the claim. In a letter subsequently written to their landlord with reference to another matter the tenants said,—“It is understood that . . . our case for landlords' taxes is in no way prejudiced.” After the date of this letter the tenants continued to pay rent for twelve years without making any further allusion to their claim.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the tenants were entitled to insist in the claim, there being no special circumstances from which abandonment was to be inferred.

In a contract bearing to be a “lease” dated in November 1871, the Corporation of the city of Glasgow “set and in tack and assedation let” to the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, “the sole right to use, for the sole purposes of ‘The Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870,’ carriages with flange wheels or other wheels specially adapted to run on a grooved rail on the whole tramways authorised to be formed by the said Act,” for the space of twenty-three years from July 1871, under the following conditions:—“First, the Corporation shall make the said tramways out of moneys to be raised or borrowed by them . . .” “Second, The company shall pay half-yearly, at Whitsunday and Martinmas, to the Corporation the amount of the interest actually paid or payable by them on (1) the total money from time to time borrowed by them and expended on the tramways and in connection therewith on capital account; and (2) on the expenses of ‘The Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870,’ and the expenses incurred by the Corporation and the board of police of Glasgow in reference thereto, and others foresaid or incident to the execution of these presents, which sums shall also be held as expenditure on capital account, declaring the amount on which such interest shall be payable shall not be affected by any payment made to the Corporation through the operation of the sinking fund hereinafter provided for; and the company shall also pay to the Corporation the expenses of borrowing, management, &c.; and this provision shall be so construed as to keep the Corporation free from all expenses whatever in connection with the said tramways. . . .” Third, The company to pay the Corporation half-yearly three per cent per annum on the gross sum from time to time expended by the Corporation on capital account as aforesaid, which three per cent should be accumulated as a sinking fund to be applied by the Corporation ultimately towards the reduction or extinction of the cost of constructing the tramways. “Fifth, The company shall maintain, repair, and, so far as

Tramway and

Limited, v.
Corporation of City of Glasgow.

In 1895, after the expiration of the lease, the tramway company brought an action against the Corporation for payment (1) of £14,246, 5s. 0½d. as the proportion of the landlords' assessments, rates, and taxes, local and imperial, paid by them during the currency of the lease, in respect of the tramways leased by them, of which the Corporation was bound to relieve them.

The pursuers averred that they had paid these assessments, rates, and taxes, in terms of section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854,* and had repeatedly demanded repayment without success.

The defenders admitted that the pursuers had paid the landlords' rates and taxes in question, but denied that they were liable in repayment, or that the amount sued for was the proportion corresponding to the rent paid by the pursuers. They further admitted that the pursuers had advanced a claim for repayment, but averred that they had subsequently abandoned it.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders being bound to free and relieve the pursuers of the proportion of the landlords' taxes paid by them in respect of the defenders' tramways which corresponds to the rent paid by the pursuers, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, with expenses.

* Section 6 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), enacts “that in estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might, in their actual state, be reasonably expected to let from year to year. . . . Provided always that if such lands and heritages be let upon a lease, the stipulated duration of which is more than twenty-one years from the date of entry under the same . . . the rent payable under such lease shall not necessarily be assessed as the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages, but such yearly rent or value shall be ascertained in terms of this Act irrespective of the amount of rent payable under such lease, and the lessee under such lease shall be deemed and taken to be also the proprietor of such lands and heritages in the sense of this Act, but shall be entitled to relief from the actual proprietor thereof, and to deduction from the rent payable by him to such actual proprietor, of such proportion of all assessments laid on upon the valuations of such lands and heritages made under this Act, and payable by such lessee as proprietor in the sense of this Act, as shall correspond to the rent payable by such lessee to such actual proprietor as compared with the amount of such valuation.”

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant, No. 116. and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The pursuers are barred from insisting in the present action by mora, and acquiescence, and by the actings of parties, and in respect the whole payments were made by them in full knowledge of the facts.

Proof was allowed. In regard to the defenders' plea of bar, the evidence shewed that the pursuers' claim of relief was first made prior to 1879, and was renewed in that year. The claim was repudiated by the Corporation. For the settlement of the dispute, the parties attempted to adjust a special case, but the attempt to settle the dispute in this way failed, for the reason set forth in the following minute of meeting of the committee of the Corporation on tramways held on 24th November 1881 :—"The town-clerk reported that it having been found impossible to adjust with the tramway company a statement of the information desired by the Court of Session in connection with the special case for them and the Corporation in reference to the liability for landlords' taxes, the case had been withdrawn. He also reported that the company had suggested that the question at issue might be decided under a reference. After some conversation, consideration of the matter was delayed."

On 18th April 1882 Mr Duncan, manager of the tramway company, wrote to Mr Nicol, the city chamberlain, a letter, dealing with various matters, which contained this passage,—“It is understood that, although we pay the sinking fund without deducting income-tax, our case for landlords' taxes is in no way prejudiced thereby,” and in a letter written four days later to the town-clerk, Dr Marwick, Mr Duncan, after referring to a compromise arranged between the parties as to another matter, concluded,—“It is also understood that our rights in connection with landlords' taxes are in no way prejudiced.” No evidence was adduced by the defenders to shew that they had repudiated this understanding.

From 1882 to the end of the lease in 1894 no communications were made by either of the parties to the other in regard to the pursuers' claim of relief, and during this period the company continued to pay the whole rates and taxes in respect of the tramways. During the same period the Corporation made certain additions to the tramway system, and in 1882, 1885, and 1886 negotiations (which resulted in agreements) in reference to the working of these additional lines took place between the parties. In 1889 also negotiations (which proved abortive) took place with regard to a renewal of the principal lease. In draft “conditions of let” prepared by the Corporation at this time there was an express stipulation that the tenants should pay the landlords' rates and taxes, including those exigible in respect of ownership.

It was admitted by Mr Duncan, the manager of the tramway company,* that during these various negotiations the company inten-

* In cross-examination Mr Duncan deposed,—“The letter of April 1882 shews that we protested against the payments being made, and that the claim was undoubtedly an outstanding one. I was present at the meetings of the directors, and was fully acquainted with the views and intentions of the company in regard to this matter, and the directors never for a moment intended that the claim should be abandoned. (Q.) What did you intend the Corporation to understand? (A.) That we would raise an action against them if they did not pay. (Q.) What communication did you make to them which was calculated to lead them to think that? (A.) The letters tionally abstained from pressing their claim of relief from the fear that the Corporation might make it a condition of the leases which were the subject of negotiation that the company should abandon their claim. In reference to this matter Sir James Marwick, who had been town-clerk since 1873, gave it as his opinion that the company would not have got such good terms as they did in the agreements of 1882, 1885, and 1886, if it had not been the understanding of the Corporation that the claim of relief was abandoned.*

On 2d December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"With respect to the first conclusion in the action at the instance of the tramway company, finds (1) that the defenders are bound to relieve the pursuers of the landlord's or owner's assessments, rates, and taxes, whether local or imperial, paid by the pursuers in respect of the tramways leased by the defenders to the pursuers during the period from 1st July 1871 to 1st July 1894, being the period of the currency of the lease between the parties, No. 7 of process; but that only to the extent of such proportion of the said assessments, rates, and taxes as corresponds to the rent payable by the pursuers to the defenders in respect of the said tramways, as compared with the amount of the valuation of the said tramways under the Valuation Acts; (2) that the rent payable to the defenders in the sense of the Valuation Acts, and particularly the 6th section of the

that I wrote in 1882. (Q.) If you intended the Corporation to understand that, why did you delay pressing the claim? (A.) Because we are afraid that the Corporation might include these landlord's taxes in any negotiations we might have in connection with leasing the lines in 1884 and 1886, and make it a part of the condition that we should abandon them. (Q.) Was it of set purpose that the Company abstained from renewing the claim between 1882 and the end of the lease? (A.) Well, we did not renew it. (Q.) Did you intentionally abstain from renewing it? (A.) Yes, we did. (Q.) And for the purpose of affecting the Corporation's mind in business communications between you and them during that period? (A.) We did not intend to affect the Corporation's mind one way or another. The prospective business negotiations with the Corporation which we thought might be affected were in connection with the Central Tramways Extension in 1884, the Springburn Extension in 1886, and the renewal of our lease in 1889. We desired that the negotiations in connection with these matters should not be complicated with this landlords' taxes question at all, which was a thing entirely apart from them."

* In cross-examination Sir James Marwick deponed,—“(Q.) Do you say that that claim so standing, made in April 1882, was treated by you as abandoned in negotiating the agreement which was signed in July 1882? (A.) In all the subsequent negotiations I have no hesitation in saying the Corporation treated this as not intended to be insisted upon. I say so because if they had understood it was to be pressed, the whole aspect of the negotiations would have been changed; the tramway company were given certain terms which they would not have got if this claim had been standing. I have no doubt whatever that if there had been any intimation made in the course of the negotiations for subsequent extensions of lines of a reservation of this claim, the company would not have got the extensions, or it would have been made a specific condition that the claim should be withdrawn. (Q.) Is not that merely a problematical opinion? (A.) It is an opinion which, as being conversant with the whole negotiations, I have no hesitation in expressing. By the Court.—(Q.) How soon after the letter of 22d April 1882 did you assume that the claim had been abandoned? (A.) I cannot answer that question just now; it is impossible to say.”

Valuation (Scotland) Act of 1854, and therefore the rent to be considered for the purposes of the preceding finding, includes the whole payments made by the pursuers to the defenders as the consideration for the use of the said tramways, and in particular includes the whole payments embraced in the several columns of the state No. 68 of process,* excepting the column headed 'Renewal of lines and streets, actual expenditure'; (3) finds, with respect to the payments in said column, that the parties are at issue as to how far the said payments include repairs as distinguished from renewals, and are agreed that further inquiry is therefore necessary: Therefore, as regards the said first conclusion, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure," &c.†

* These payments were stated under the headings (1) interest of capital borrowed by the Corporation for the construction of the tramways; (2) interest at 3 per cent on amount expended on construction to be accumulated as a sinking fund; (3) mileage rate; (4) sums paid to officials of Corporation for secretarial and accounting work and inspection of lines; and (5) "renewal of lines and streets—actual expenditure."

† "OPINION.—This is an action in which the Glasgow Tramways Company are pursuers and the Corporation of Glasgow are defenders, and it is brought to settle certain outstanding questions between the company and the Corporation, arising out of the lease of the tramways by the Corporation to the company which was granted in 1871 and expired in July 1894.

"The first question relates to the landlords' or owners' taxes or assessments payable in respect of the tramways during the currency of the lease. These taxes were levied upon and paid by the company as being—by reason of the length of their lease—owners of the tramways system for the purposes of the Valuation Acts, and the question is whether—and how far—the company can now claim relief from the Corporation under the 6th section of the Valuation Act of 1854, which in effect provides that when a lessee is assessed as owner by reason of the length of his lease he shall be entitled to relief from the actual owner, and to a deduction from the rent payable by him to such actual owner of such proportion of the assessments paid by him as shall correspond to the rent payable by him to such actual owner.

"The defenders' case is (1) that the lease of 1871, although so titled and called, was not really a lease, but a nondescript agreement, under which there was no rent in the proper sense, and no constitution in the proper sense of the relation of landlord and tenant—lessor and lessee; (2) that, supposing this to be otherwise, the statutory right of relief was excluded by a stipulation in the lease that the tramway company should pay to the Corporation 'the expenses of borrowing, management, &c.,' and that this provision should 'be so construed as to keep the Corporation free from all expenses whatever in connection with said tramways'; (3) that in any event the claim now made is barred, because the sum claimed ought to have been deducted annually from the rent paid to the Corporation. What I have to decide is, whether any and which of those defences is well founded.

"(1) I am of opinion that the contract of 1871 was not only in name but in reality a contract of lease, and that the relation which it constituted between the parties was truly and properly the relation of landlord and tenant. I do not, I confess, see why this should be doubted. The subject of the contract was a heritable structure built into and forming part of the streets of Glasgow, and specially adapted for a certain valuable use. The Corporation were owners of this structure, and for payment annually of certain sums of money they conferred on the tramway company the sole right to use the structure,—that is to say, the sole right to use it in the only way in which such use was valuable. The right thus conferred was, moreover, for a definite term of years; and the annual payments (which were

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—1. The pursuers could not take advantage of the provisions of section 6 of the Valuation Act. (1) The Act did not apply, because the pursuers were not in the position of lessees. The right conferred upon them was not an exclusive right of occupation, but only an exclusive licence—a right created by statute—to use carriages with flange-wheels on lines which were run over by the ordinary traffic of the city. This right was not a lettable subject, but in its nature resembled a right of servitude, and was analogous to a grant of running powers, which had been held not to be an assessable subject.¹ Further, the reddendo stipulated for was not a fair return for the use of the subject “let,” but amounted to repayment of the cost of creating the subject. (2) The meaning of the second article of the “lease” was that the Corporation should have no outlay in connection with the tramways. Fairly construed, the “expenses” of which the Corporation were to be kept free must be held to include rates and taxes. (3) The right of relief given by section 6 could only be made good by way of deduction from the rent of each year.² 2. If the pursuers ever had a right of relief, they had all, if not of specified, yet of ascertainable amount) were none the less rent because not called by that name, or because broken up into several portions, earmarked as applicable to different purposes of the lessors. Altogether I am unable to doubt that, if the arrangement had been for less than twenty-one years, the tramway company must have appeared in the Valuation-roll as tenants and occupiers and the Corporation as owners, and also that the annual value of the subject must have been taken as the sum of the different annual payments, which sum must have been held to be, for the purposes of the Valuation Acts, the stipulated rent.

“(2) In the next place, I am of opinion that the pursuers’ claim as lessees to relief of owners’ taxes is not excluded by the stipulation in the lease on which the defenders found. The taxes—local or imperial—paid by the owner of property in respect of his ownership are not, I think, identical or ejusdem generis with expenses of borrowing or expenses of management. They are not properly expenses in connection with the owner’s property, although the income from that property may form their measure. They are rather personal burdens imposed upon the owner as a citizen, the amount of which is estimated in a particular way. If a tenant taking a house binds himself in general terms to keep his landlord free of ‘all expenses connected with it,’ he would not, I think, be held to undertake to pay the property or income-tax which the landlord has to pay in respect of his rent. Still less would he be held to do so if the general obligation was subjoined to an obligation with reference to specific expenses of a quite different character. In the present case the question would, I suppose, have been the same had the lease of the tramways been a short instead of a long lease, and had the owners’ assessments been laid on the owner direct. I do not say that even in such a case an obligation of the kind suggested might not be lawfully undertaken, but it would, at least in my opinion, require very special and unequivocal words to impose upon a tenant liability to pay his landlord’s taxes, whether imperial or local.

“(3) Lastly, with respect to the non-deduction of the taxes from each lost it. Having voluntarily paid rent without making a deduction to which they were entitled, they could have no claim for repetition.¹ Their last communications on the subject in 1882 did not amount to a proper reservation of their right, and as they had deliberately abstained from pressing the claim during the remaining twelve years of the lease, in order to avoid prejudicing their chance of obtaining favourable terms in their various negotiations with the Corporation, and agreements had been entered into by the Corporation in the faith that it had been abandoned, they were barred from now reviving it. 3. Details of Claim.—Assuming that the pursuers had a right to relief, they were not entitled in computing their claim to treat any payments made under the lease as rent in the sense of section 6, except such as were the consideration for the use of the subject let. The only payment which could fairly be considered as rent in this sense was the mileage rate.

Argued for the pursuers ;—1. The pursuers were entitled to claim relief under the 6th section of the Valuation Act. (1) They held under an instrument which bore to be a lease, and had all the essentials year's rent as it fell due, it is certainly unfortunate that this and other disputed questions under the lease were not brought to an issue when they first arose. They appear to have formed the subject of a special case presented to the Court in 1880 ; but that case having been partly heard and allowed to stand over for some amendment, a reference appears to have been then proposed, and then, as appears from the Corporation minutes of the 24th November 1881 (the last on the subject), 'consideration of the matter was delayed.' And certainly the delay thus initiated has extended over a long period. It cannot, however, be said that anything then or afterwards passed between the parties which can be construed into a discharge or abandonment by the company of the present claim. It may be that that claim is of a nature which did not admit of being effectually reserved. I shall consider that immediately. But that it was in fact reserved is, I think, sufficiently apparent from the terms of the minute I have just quoted, and from the letters by the company's secretary to the city chamberlain and town-clerk of 18th and 22d April 1882. In the absence of any repudiation by the defenders of the understanding therein expressed, it is, I think, difficult to hold otherwise than that they (the defenders) acquiesced in the reservation.

"But the question remains, whether the pursuers' claim—depending as it does on the words of the Valuation Statute—admitted of being made good otherwise than by way of deduction from the rent of each year. The argument of the defenders is that, but for the express provision contained in the 6th section, no claim of relief would have existed ; and that it was an express condition of the right of relief conferred by the statute that it should be made good in a particular way, viz., by deducting and retaining from each year's rent the statutory proportion of the landlord's taxes paid by the tenant for the particular year. That is the argument, and it was supported by reference to certain English cases, and particularly the case of Denby v. Moore, 1 B. and A. 123, 18 R. R. 444 ; Andrew v. Hancock, 3 Moore, 278, 21 R. R. 569 ; Spragg, 4 Moore, 431 ; Cumming, 15 M. and W. 438. See also Dowell on Income-Tax, notes, page 67, 4th ed.

"Now, had the language of the statute here to be construed been identical with or similar to the language of the Acts (viz., the Property and Income-Tax and Land-Tax Acts) which were under construction in those English of a lease. The subject let was the exclusive right to use carriages with flange-wheels on the tramways. This right was not the less a lettable subject because it was a private right—created by statute—carved out of public property, and the money payments which the pursuers were under obligation to make were not the less rent for the use of the subject let because they were calculated at a rate which would reimburse the defenders for their capital outlay. The right conferred upon the pursuers was not the same as a grant of running powers, for a running power company had not exclusive possession of the line over which the powers were exercised. The ground of decision in the *Midland Railway Company's*¹ case was simply that two railways could not be rated for the same subject. Tramways laid on cases, there would, I think, have been force in this part of the defenders' case. It is perhaps difficult to say how far the decisions referred to proceeded on the peculiarities of the old system of English pleading. But, unless explained on that ground, they do seem to affirm what seems in itself a quite reasonable proposition, viz., that when a tenant is charged under a Revenue Statute—say with property-tax—and the statute provides that he may and shall deduct the tax so paid from his rent, that means that he shall deduct it from the rent of the year, and does not mean that the payments made may be set off against subsequent rents, or may be recovered in a subsequent action, brought as for repetition of rent overpaid, on the principle (as we should put it) of condictio indebiti. Had, therefore, the pursuers here been confined to the remedy of deduction from the rent, there would, as I have said, have been strong grounds for holding that the principle of those English cases applied. The only question would then have been whether the reservation expressed by the pursuers in 1882 had been so accepted by the defenders as to constitute in effect an agreement between the parties that the claim in question should remain open for after adjustment.

"But I am not able to read the 6th section of the Valuation Act as the defenders read it. It certainly does not—like, e.g., the Property-Tax Acts—require the deduction to be made from the rent,—a requirement no doubt designed to prevent agreements between landlord and tenant involving practically under-statement of the true rent. But, apart from that, the scheme of the enactment seems to me to be this. There is first provided in quite absolute terms a right of relief, and then there is superadded a further and special right (not necessarily implied in the other) to retain the amount due from the rent payable under the lease. That is, I think, the fair reading of the enactment. Nor can it, I think, be said that this superadded right was meaningless or unnecessary. It is not, as we know, every claim which can be set off against rent; and it may very well have been desired to exclude difficulties of that description with reference to these claims of relief—claims not necessarily or always liquid, but quite possibly involving (as in the present case) points of controversy, or points requiring adjustment. In any case the statute does not say in words what the defenders suggest, and I should have expected it to do so if it were so meant. It would, for example, have been easy to say,—‘The lessee shall be entitled to relief from the actual proprietor by way of deduction from the rent payable to such actual proprietor of such proportion, &c. of the assessments which he (the lessee) has paid.’ But that is not what the statute says.

"On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that, as regards this first head of their claim, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the summons."

public streets were an assessable subject,¹ just as water-pipes laid under public streets.² (2) The general word "expenses" in the second article of the lease could only be held to cover expenses ejusmodi generis as those previously enumerated, and could not be held to cover taxation. It was not to be lightly assumed that the incidence of taxation had been altered by agreement. (3) The Valuation Act conferred upon the tenant a right of relief, and in addition a right to operate this relief by way of deduction from the rent, but it did not confine the tenant to the remedy of reduction. A similar double right—to recover from the landlord or retain from the rent—had been given in the Poor-Law Act of 1845,³ and the provision conferring right to deduct from the rent was probably necessary to enable a tenant to set off expenditure on rates and taxes against rent. The English cases in regard to property and income-tax and land-tax did not apply, for the Acts⁴ dealing with these taxes required the right of relief to be operated by way of deduction. 2. The right of relief had never been abandoned. The last communication on the subject in 1882 was a clear intimation that it was reserved. Short of the known prescriptions, a gratuitous quittance of a just claim was not to be easily presumed, and would not be presumed unless one party misled the other into the belief that the claim had been abandoned, and so induced him to alter his position for the worse. Here the pursuers did nothing to induce such an erroneous belief on the part of the defenders, and as matter of fact the defenders never entertained such a belief, as was shewn by the fact that the draft conditions of let prepared by them in 1889 contained an express provision that the pursuers should have no right of relief. The cases of game and other damage were not in point. In such cases the evidence was of a fugitive character, and injustice might easily result if a claim of which notice was not given at the time were allowed afterwards to be insisted in. Here notice was given of the claim, and the defenders were in no way prejudiced by the delay in enforcing it. 3. The whole annual payments which the pursuers were bound to make by the lease must be computed as rent.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Although each of the several questions involved in this case has been very carefully argued before us, I am not only satisfied of the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but I think his Lordship's opinion contains a remarkably complete statement of the true result of the argument. What I shall add is intended to be in confirmation of, and not at all in substitution for, the views there explained.

(1) The right enjoyed by a company or individual entitled to the sole use for a term of years, by tramway cars, of a tramway line under the Tramway Acts, is a singular one, and it is not surprising that the return rendered by the occupant to the owner should also be calculated on unusual lines.

Limited, v.
Corporation

The company have the sole right to use, in the appropriate way, a structure with which certain of the streets are fitted. They occupy the tramway, and the fact that other people use in a different way the road on which the tramway is fitted, and actually pass over the tramway, does not make the company's use of the tramway the less a mode of occupation peculiar to themselves.

On the other hand, the right of occupation being for a term of years, and there being a yearly return in money rendered by the company, it seems to me that the mode or principle according to which the amount of that return is calculated does not make it the less rent.

(2) In my opinion the word "expenses" in the agreement cannot be held to cover the liability of the Corporation to relieve the company of the landlords' share of taxes. In the first place, the Corporation have not in fact expended anything. By the statute the whole taxes are paid by the tenant. But even when the nature of the ultimate liability of the Corporation is considered, it is seen how remote it is from that of expenses in the sense of the agreement. A landlord is charged with taxes by reason of his property in heritage, and as a contribution to the revenue of the state, in respect of his ostensible wealth. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that reading the word "expenses" in the context in which it stands, those taxes are outside its scope.

(3) The next question is whether a tenant is limited to deduction as the only mode of effectuating his right of relief. On this point, again, I entirely adopt the Lord Ordinary's reasoning. The statute gives the right of relief in general terms, plus this, and as a mode, but not the only mode, of making it good—the tenant gets the right at his own hand to deduct the taxes from the rent.

(4) If, then, the tenant, by abstaining from making the deduction, did not, under the statute, eo ipso lose his right of relief, has he deprived himself of it? Now, without going into details, it is enough to say that the right of relief was asserted, never withdrawn, and on more occasions than one expressly mentioned as being reserved. This being so, it does not seem to me that the periodical payment of rent imported an abandonment of this claim. The case is distinguished by the nature of the claim from the cases in which claims of damages as between landlord and tenant have been held to be waived by the payment of rent. This is not a claim of damages, but a claim of debt created by statute, and of precisely ascertained amount. It does not depend on circumstances, nor is it dependent on evidence of a fugitive character, as is the case with most of the claims between landlord and tenant. Accordingly, it is in the region of claims of debt which fall under the negative prescription only, unless in circumstances in which by special conduct a direct implication of abandonment is raised.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Police—Public Street—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.) secs. 286 and 290.—The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, enacts, sec. 286,—“The Master of Works, by direction of the board jointly with the proprietor of any land or heritage adjoining to and having a right of access by any private street or court . . . may apply at any time to the Dean of Guild to declare the said street or court, or any part thereof, to be a public street, and the Dean of Guild . . . shall inquire into and decide the question raised in such application, and may direct the registrar to enter such private street or court in the register of public streets. . . .”

Sec. 290.—“Every proprietor who intends to lay out or to form any street shall make application to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to do so . . . and the proprietor shall state in his application whether such street is intended to be a public street or a private street . . . and the Dean of Guild shall cause the Master of Works, and any other person whom he considers interested, to be cited, and allow them time to examine the said plans and sections, and lodge answers, or be heard with respect to the application. Provided that where any proprietor shall satisfy the Board as to the level and the suitability for drainage of any such street, it shall be lawful for the Board if such street is not less than forty feet in width to dispense with an application to the Dean of Guild, and if such street be intended to be a public street . . . to issue a warrant . . . endorsed by such proprietor as concurring therein declaring such street to be a public street. . . .”

A proprietor of vacant ground in Glasgow presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for the lining of a street, stating that he intended to form a public street. After the Master of Works had been cited, the petitioner obtained a warrant from the Dean of Guild to form the intended street “as a public street.” When the street was formed he presented a petition to the Dean of Guild craving him to declare the street a public street. The petition, which was opposed by the Master of Works as incompetent, was granted. The Master of Works having appealed, the Court dismissed the petition as incompetent, holding that the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction under sec. 290 to declare a street a public street, but only under sec. 286, on a joint application by the proprietor and the Master of Works.

ON 15th February 1896 Lieutenant-Colonel Sewell and others, the 1st Division, testamentary trustees of William Smith Dixon of Govanhill, and as Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow, such trustees proprietors of a vacant area of ground bounded, inter alia, on the north by Aitkenhead Road, and on the east by Batson Street, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild in Glasgow craving the Court to appoint a copy of the petition, and of the deliverance thereon, to be served upon the Master of Works for the public interest and certain other persons, and upon advising the petition “to line the street after mentioned.”

The petitioners stated that they proposed “to form and lay off a public street from Aitkenhead Road to Batson Street on said area of ground as shewn on the plan produced. Said proposed street is 60 feet wide . . .”

The Dean of Guild granted warrant to cite the Master of Works and other persons.

On 20th February 1896 the Dean of Guild granted warrant “to the petitioners to form the intended street . . . as a public street of 60 feet in width; lines the boundaries of the same . . .”

Dixon's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

Thereafter the trustees, having formed the street, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild craving the Court to appoint service of the petition upon John Whyte, Master of Works for the city of Glasgow, and "to declare that the street laid off by the petitioners leading southward from Aitkenhead Road 112 yards or thereby (now known as Robson Street), conform to warrant of your Lordship's Court dated 20th February 1896, is a public street, and to direct the Registrar of Public Streets to enter said street in the Register of Public Streets."

Answers were lodged by the Master of Works, who stated—and this was admitted by the petitioners—that on 14th August 1896 the trustees made application to the Corporation of Glasgow to have the street taken over as public, and the Corporation, for the reasons that the street was neither fenced nor lighted, declined to entertain the application.

The respondent further stated;—"The street at the present date is a private one. Under section 290 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the Dean of Guild is authorised to grant authority for the forming and laying off a street which may be intended to be a public or a private street. That authority was exercised by the Dean of Guild by the said warrant of date 20th February last. Further, under that section it is provided that the Corporation, if satisfied as to the level and the suitability for drainage and the width of the street, may dispense with an application to the Dean of Guild, and may declare the street to be a public street, and may direct the same to be entered in the register, subject to such conditions, if any, as may be agreed on.

"In this case the Corporation were prepared, if provision were made for lighting and fencing, to direct that the street be taken over as public, but these conditions were not agreed to by the petitioners, and therefore the only remaining provision for having the street declared public is under section 286 of the 1866 Act, and that section provides as a condition precedent that the Master of Works, by direction of the Corporation, jointly with the proprietors, shall make application to the Dean of Guild to have the street declared a public one.

"In this case no such direction was given by the Corporation, and the Master of Works has not made a joint application with the proprietors; accordingly there is no competent petition before the Court, and the petition should be dismissed, with expenses."

The parties referred to the sections of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, noted below.*

* Section 4.—" 'Public street' shall mean any road, street, . . . or other place within the city . . . which has been maintained by the Police and Statute Labour Committee, or which is by this Act or shall hereafter in pursuance thereof, be declared to be a public street. 'Private street' shall mean any such road, street, . . . which has not been maintained by the Police and Statute Labour Committee, and is not by this Act, or shall not hereafter be in pursuance thereof, declared a public street."

Section 282.—"It shall be the duty of the registrar from time to time to enter in the Register of Public Streets . . . any street which is declared by the Dean of Guild . . . to be a public street . . . and the entry . . . in the said register . . . shall be conclusive evidence of what are public streets . . ."

Section 290.—"Every proprietor who intends to lay out or to form any street shall make application to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to do so, and every proprietor who has already laid out or formed any street on which no building has been erected shall make application to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to sanction such street, and in either case the proprietor shall state in his application whether such street is intended to be a public street or a private street, and what is the maximum height above its level of the buildings intended to be erected, and shall produce along with such application a plan and longitudinal section of such street, and a plan, with cross sections at right angles to such street, of the lands adjoining the same: And the Dean of Guild shall cause the Master of Works and any other persons whom he considers interested to be cited, and allow them time to examine the said plans and sections, and lodge answers, or be heard with respect to the application: Provided that where any proprietor shall satisfy the board as to the level and the suitability for drainage of any such street, it shall be lawful for the board, if such street is not less than forty feet in width, to dispense with an application to the Dean of Guild, and if such street be intended to be a public street and will lead from a turnpike road or public street to either a turnpike road or public street, to issue a warrant under their common seal, indorsed by such proprietor as concurring therein, declaring such street to be a public street, and directing the registrar to enter the same in the Register of Public Streets, subject to such conditions, if any, as may be agreed on; but it shall not be lawful for the proprietor of any land or heritage adjoining any street which is laid out or formed without an application to the Dean of Guild to erect thereon any dwelling-house the front walls of which shall exceed in height the width of such street, nor, without the express authority of the Dean of Guild, to erect thereon any other building, the front walls of which shall exceed in height the width of such street by more than one-fourth part thereof."

Section 291.—"If the application to the Dean of Guild relates to an intended public street, and is granted by him . . . the proprietor making such application shall acquiesce in and fulfil any conditions which he may impose with reference to the following matters"—width of street, height of buildings, and causewaying.

The Master of Works appealed, and argued;—The petition was under no section of the Act, and was incompetent. It was not disputed that the Dean of Guild might declare a street a public street, but he could only do so under section 286, on the joint application of the Corporation and the proprietor. The fallacy underlying the Dean of Guild's judgment was this: He thought that no street could be a ccxxxix.), sec. 14, enacts,—“The powers conferred upon the Dean of Guild by section 291 of the Act of 1866, with reference to intended public streets shall also belong to and be exercised by him with reference to intended private streets.”

* “NOTE.—On 20th February 1896, it is admitted that the petitioners obtained warrant from the Dean of Guild to form a street (now known as Robson Street) as a public street 60 feet in width. The street has now been formed, and in this petition they ask the Dean of Guild to declare it a public street, and to direct the Registrar of Public Streets to enter it in the register. The Master of Works objects that the street at present is a private street (by which he means that as yet it has not been declared public, nor entered in the register as a public street), and that it can only be declared public by the Dean of Guild in an application presented under sec. 286 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, by the Master of Works by direction of the Commissioners jointly with the petitioners. This is certainly a startling contention, for it comes to this, that under secs. 290 and 291 of the statute a proprietor can never get a street which the Dean of Guild has sanctioned as a public street entered on the Register of Public Streets without the concurrence of the Commissioners, who may make what conditions they please. According to this view an application to the Dean of Guild to sanction a street as a public street under sec. 290 must necessarily result in its first being sanctioned as a private street, though such sanction, as in this case, has neither been asked nor granted, and then, if the Police Commissioners so direct, an application may be presented by the Master of Works to have the private street declared public under sec. 286. The Dean of Guild thinks this contention untenable, and thinks that an application under sec. 286 would have been quite incompetent in the present case, even if the petitioners could have obtained the necessary concurrence, because Robson Street has never been sanctioned by the Dean of Guild as a private street, and without such sanction it cannot be a private street, and therefore cannot be the subject of an application under sec. 286. The real difference between the Master of Works and the Commissioners, on the one hand, and the petitioners, on the other, relates apparently to the burden of lighting and fencing the street, and the Dean of Guild expresses no opinion on the merits of this dispute. The only question raised before the Dean of Guild was whether the Commissioners alone have the power of declaring a street public and putting it on the register, making what conditions they please on giving their warrant under sec. 290, or otherwise, whether the application must originate with them under sec. 286. The Dean of Guild thinks, on the contrary, that any proprietor proposing to form a public street may apply to the Dean of Guild, under sec. 290, to sanction it, and that not only the Dean of Guild may give authority to form the street, but also after its formation may declare it public, and direct it to be entered on the register.

. . . No doubt the petitioners applied to the Corporation to have this street declared public, but this error on their part—as the Dean of Guild considers it—cannot prejudice them in now applying to the Dean of Guild. The original petition might fittingly have contained also the prayer of the present petition, and, indeed, that is the more appropriate procedure, and would have made this mistake impossible.”

private street unless he had sanctioned its formation as such, and, on the other hand, that if he granted a warrant for the formation of a street which was declared to be intended for a public street, that street whenever formed ipso facto became a public street. That, however, was directly in the teeth of the statute, which said that every street remained a private street until declared a public street. The mere expression therefore of an intention to construct a street as a public street did not make it any the less a private street prior to its being declared a public street. The reason why an applicant had to declare whether the street was intended to be a public or private street was because, under sections 291 and 292, the Dean of Guild was entitled to impose conditions in the case of a public street. That also explained why the Master of Works required to be cited. The necessity for the declaration had now flown off because of the provisions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1892, and accordingly the ground of the petitioner's argument was removed. In this particular case, if the Dean of Guild had the jurisdiction claimed for him, the public interest would clearly suffer, for the fencing and lighting of this public street would be left unprovided for. The interlocutor of 20th February 1896 was ultra vires, in so far as it sanctioned the formation of a "public" street. All that could be, and all that was, asked in the original petition was a lining of a "street," and accordingly the warrant then granted was exhausted when the street was formed. The street remained a private street until declared a public street, either by the Corporation under agreement with the proprietor, or by the Dean of Guild upon the joint application of the proprietor and the Master of Works under section 286.

Argued for the petitioners;—The Dean of Guild was right. The present petition was merely in continuation of the original application, which might and should have contained a prayer to have the street, when formed, declared a public street. So to declare it was evidently within the competency of the Dean of Guild under section 290. It was true the power was not conferred in so many words, but neither was power to dispose in any way of the application to him. And yet it was not disputed that he had power to line a street. The jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild to declare a street a public street, the formation of which as such he had already sanctioned, was a necessary inference from the whole provisions of the section. If the Corporation were otherwise satisfied, they could dispense with the application to the Dean of Guild, and at once declare the street a public street; if they were not satisfied, then application had to be made to the Dean of Guild, obviously that he might, after hearing parties, if so advised, declare the street a public street. The public interests were completely safeguarded, for the Master of Works required to be cited, and then was his opportunity to see that due provision was made for such matters as drainage, fencing, and lighting. Accordingly, the original application to the Dean of Guild being for a lining of a public street, his warrant of 20th February was in quite a competent and appropriate form, and the character of the street was once for all determined. Section 286 only applied to the case of a street originally formed as a private street, not to a street which from the very outset was destined to be a public street. The proposed transformation from a private to a public street naturally made it necessary that the Corporation should be parties to the application. Here there was no such necessity.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the judgment of the Dean of Guild is wrong. I think that this is not a competent proceeding under the 290th section of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866. The application craves the Dean of Guild to declare that the street in question is a public street, and to direct the Registrar of Public Streets to enter the street in the Register of Public Streets.

Now, the question is whether section 290 warrants that application. There is this to be observed, in the first place, that the words of the prayer seeking for a declaration that the street is a public street, and to have it entered in the register, are manifestly intended to apply to section 282, because the register therein provided is to contain those streets which have been declared by the Dean of Guild to be public streets. The real question in this case is, whether a declaration in that sense is obtainable under section 290, or whether it is only obtainable under section 286. Now, I think that the argument in support of the judgment proceeds upon this mistake,—it assumes that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, under section 290, is a jurisdiction, first, to authorise the construction of something as a public street, and then, on that being done, to declare it a public street. To my thinking, section 290 has the much more limited effect which is contended for by the Corporation of Glasgow. The main and substantial enactment in section 290 is, that anybody who intends to lay out or form a new street shall not be entitled to do so within the town of Glasgow until he gets the authority of the Dean of Guild for that physical operation. And accordingly, disregarding in the meantime the additional or parenthetical parts of the section, the case purported to be dealt with is a case of someone who, having vacant ground, intends to make a street on it. He cannot do that within burgh unless he gets the authority of the Dean of Guild. But, then, quite incidentally to that, the Act says, or, rather, said—because all this turns out to be abandoned and superseded by subsequent legislation—“You must in your petition say whether such street is intended to be a public street or a private street.” It does not carry that out by saying that the Dean of Guild shall authorise a public street, or a private street, as the case may be, but it merely says,—“We mention that in order to enable the Dean of Guild, even at this early stage—even at the initial stage—of physically forming a street, to require in the one case that there shall be one set of conditions, and in the other another set of conditions.” Now, as I have said, that is done away with by the subsequent Buildings Act of 1892, because the same conditions are applicable to the one case as to the other. But it is not the less clear what is the reason for the introduction of the subject of public or private streets. It is to save the useless expenditure of money in the case of what is contemplated as ultimately destined for use as a public street, and to prevent the complications which might arise from proprietors expending their money on less effective streets, so to speak, than would ultimately be accepted by the town.

But those conditions, which may have a very substantial convenience, cannot at all affect the enacting words of the section, which only authorise an application to the Dean of Guild for the purpose of authorising any street to be formed. It is sought, however, to rear up the jurisdiction now invoked by saying, but then why have the Master of Works sisted a party in these proceedings, if this has no effect on the ultimate question of a private or a public street? The answer seems to be very simple. The Master of Works is the proper official to consider questions of public safety and convenience which are equally applicable to private and to public streets. Therefore it is well that he should be there in order to see, whether it is going to be ultimately a private or a public street, that it is a safe street, and a convenient street. And it must be remembered that the town, whether it be a private or a public street, has an interest in the construction of any street, because it is the police who look after the street, although the town does not, in the case of a private street, maintain it. But then this leads one to consider what is the relation of section 290 to section 286. It seems to me that section 290 stops short with the mere warrant to construct a street. Then comes the question who is, in the end, to maintain it? Now, section 286 is the only section in the Act which, in terms, authorises the Dean of Guild to pronounce a declaration such as will warrant the registrar to proceed under section 282. And the only objection to the application of section 286 to the case in hand is that this street was authorised ab ante as a public street, and therefore cannot be a private street. Now, if my view of the limited operation of section 290 be correct, it involves this, that I think the Dean of Guild in the original proceeding went too far when he in his interlocutor granted warrant to form the intended street as a public street. I do not think that was within his province. I think his duty was merely to authorise the street to be constructed. He might well take note of the fact that, as it had been offered to him as intended to be a public street, he had had regard to the conditions applicable to intended public streets. But then when we turn to the definition clause we find that "private street" has so wide and exhaustive a construction put upon it that it includes everything which has not been declared a public street in the sense of the Act. And if I am right in saying that section 290 does not warrant the Dean of Guild in declaring a street a public street, then it follows that a street authorised under section 290 when it comes to be constructed is a private street in the sense of section 286. Upon these grounds I hold that no declaration that a street is a public street can be competent, except on the conditions and at the instance set out in section 286.

I am of opinion therefore that the judgment of the Dean of Guild must be recalled, and that the petition should be dismissed.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. If the judgment of the Dean of Guild is right, the Act would seem to put the duty, as far as certain streets are concerned, upon him to declare that they should be maintained by the community, and not by the private individual. I should not have thought that that was a duty likely to be confided to the Dean of Guild in such matters, because it is obviously more a duty lying upon the magistrates of the city to say which of the streets of the city shall be maintained at the public expense, and which shall be maintained at private expense. It does not look like a duty which is likely to be imposed on or given to the Dean of Guild, or any officer of that kind, who has more to do with buildings.

No. 117. But, no doubt, if this interlocutor or judgment is right, then, in the case of all new streets, it would be in the power of the Dean of Guild to declare, as he has done in this case, that they shall be public streets, and be maintained by the community,—a very large power to give. But with your Lordship I do not think that that was really intended. In section 290, under which this application is made, power is given to any proprietor, who intends to lay out a street, to make application to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to do so. And that proprietor may make application to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to sanction such street ; and in that application he shall state whether it is intended to be a public street or a private street, and the height of the houses, and so on. That is all he has power to arrange. Now, it is clear to me that that has reference more to the locality of the street than to anything else. It is an intended street. It is not in fact a street as yet. I can quite understand that in the laying out of an estate it is right that the whole thoroughfares, or intended thoroughfares, shall be laid out at the direction and under the instructions of the Dean of Guild, and accordingly I think this is a regulation for that purpose. It authorises a proprietor to go to the Dean of Guild, and to say,—“I am going to form a street here ; I intend that it shall be a public street ; give me authority and warrant to lay out the street.” Power is given to the Dean of Guild to do that, but there it stops. I see no authority given to the Dean of Guild except to grant a warrant to lay out or form a street in a particular line. He, no doubt, is entitled to lay down conditions under which that street shall be formed, and during its formation to act as your Lordship has said, because the formation of a street may occupy a very considerable time. During that time it may be partially open to the public. Accordingly provision is made for that state of matters by the Dean of Guild laying down certain conditions, and authority is given to the Master of Works to enforce these conditions. Authority is also given to the Dean to make conditions as to the interim maintenance of a street by the proprietor. Now, what does interim maintenance of a street mean ? Until the street is in a condition of formation to be declared to be a public or a private street. If it is a private street no application would be necessary, but if it is meant to be a public street then after all that has been done, after all those conditions are complied with, the maker of the street is in a condition to go to the Dean of Guild, with the consent of the magistrates, and ask to have this street declared to be a public street ; and the magistrates, being parties to that application, no doubt it would be granted, and the street would be declared public. But I do not think that, under this section 290, the Dean of Guild had power to do anything else than grant warrant to form a street under certain conditions. Having done that, I think his powers ceased, and therefore I agree with your Lordship.

Trustees v.
Whyte.

LORD M'LAREN.—I must confess that I began the hearing of this case with an impression very favourable to the interlocutor under review, but my opinion has been completely changed, partly by the very clear and able argument addressed to us by Mr Lees, and partly by some considerations depending on the peculiarity of the construction of local Acts of Parliament as distinguished from public Acts. I do not refer, of course, to the want of symmetry which is sometimes apparent in the clauses of local bills, No. 117.

but I mean this, that local Acts of Parliament are largely concerned with questions of property and private right, while public Acts deal rather with those relations of the citizen to the state which are independent of proprietary right. Now, in an Act of Parliament dealing with rights of property, as those Burgh Police Acts do to a large extent, one has to consider what are the rights of the parties independently of statute, and how far it is evident on the face of the Act, or probable, that such rights were intended to be interfered with. I am not sure that it has ever been directly determined what is the nature of the right which the public has in a private street, and I should not wish to express more than a provisional view on the subject for the purposes of the present case. But it seems to me that when a landowner forms a private street through his property, then, apart from the effect of statutes, he would not lose his right to that street, or give the public a perpetual right of way over it, unless by actual dedication or appropriation to public uses, or by suffering the public for time immemorial to use the street. Slight evidence of dedication might be sufficient in the case of a street in a town which was open without restriction to every one, and which had no gates or marks of private property annexed to it. But in the absence of any such dedication, and in the absence of prescriptive use by the public—or as I should say “immemorial” use—then the proprietor retains the property of the street. He may pull down the adjacent buildings and cover the area of the street with buildings upon a new design. It would therefore seem to be proper that before a private street is declared public the matter should be brought under the cognisance of some judicial authority, the Dean of Guild being obviously a very suitable judge in a question of that kind. It does appear to me that in such a case one would expect either the consent of both parties or a reference to a local judge. But again a private owner may attach very little importance to the right which he has in the solum of a street, and which he perhaps never intends to alter; and it may be an object to him to throw the burden of maintaining the street upon the public. Therefore it seems quite proper that the assent of the representatives of the community should also be required, or failing joint consent, that the matter should be determined by some neutral authority. Now, I am unable to sustain the view that under section 290 we are to read into the section by implication an interference with the powers of the Corporation in regard to the streets, or an authority to the Dean of Guild to compel them to maintain a given street as a public street independently of agreement. That might be done by Act of Parliament without shocking our sense of propriety; but unless the power were expressly given I should not assume it from the mere fact that, in the authority to present an application for a different purpose, it is said that the petition shall state whether the street is intended to be a public or a private street. I think those words are satisfied, as your Lordship has pointed out, by the necessity of stating the proprietor's intention in regard to the future, so that the Dean of Guild shall see that the street was properly made and the drains properly arranged, and everything done upon the system which had been established for the regulation of public streets. It by no means follows that a street is to be declared a public street in such an application.

No. 117. On the contrary, we are referred to a different section, 286, where that may be done with different safeguards, and under different conditions.

Mar. 4, 1897.
Dixon's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

I agree with your Lordships who have spoken, in holding that the Dean of Guild was in error in sustaining the application by a proprietor not assented to by the Master of Works on the part of the Corporation.

LORD KINNAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I think that the 290th section of the statute empowers the Dean of Guild to sanction the construction of a street. But it does not in terms empower him to declare that the street so made shall be a public street. After the street has been constructed according to certain conditions, the question is, under what authority can it be declared to be a public street in terms of the statute, with the result of throwing upon the community obligations which had previously been laid upon the proprietor of the lands? The only section to which we have been referred as directly authorising such an application to be made is the 286th, and I agree with your Lordships that that is inapplicable to the present case. It is said that it is not inapplicable because the street now in question was not a private street, because the Dean of Guild in giving his original sanction to its construction sanctioned it as a public street. In adding these words the Dean of Guild went beyond the precise terms of the prayer of the petition before him. But still he was called upon by the statute to consider, and no doubt very properly considered, whether the street was intended to be public or private, and gave his sanction upon the hypothesis that it was to be a public street. That was necessary for the exercise of his jurisdiction under the 290th section, because the statute requires that the applicant for such sanction shall state in his application whether he intends the street to be public or private. And then it goes on to authorise the Dean of Guild to impose conditions in the event of its being intended to be a public street, but it does not enable him to impose conditions if it is to be a private street.

We are informed that by a later statute the conditions which he might impose only in the case of the intention to construct a public street under the Act of 1866 belong to him now, and are constantly exercised by him with reference to the construction of private streets also, under the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1892. But although he may exercise the same powers in the one case as in the other, I presume it is still of importance that he should know whether it is the intention of the applicant to make his street public or private, because the conditions may be applicable in one degree or another, according as the future condition of the street is to be private or public. But while he has to take into account the future destiny of the street—the design of the applicant in making it a public or a private street—there is still nothing in the section which enables him to do more than to sanction its construction. Now, when it has been constructed the question is, whether it is enough to make it a public street that the Dean of Guild has authorised its construction in that view—because that is really the theory upon which the judgment is based—that the question is settled once for all by the Dean sanctioning the construction of the street with a view to its becoming public. But then that sends us to the definition clause of the statute to see what a public street is, and that makes it perfectly clear that something further remains to be done, because a public street is "any road or street within the city which has been maintained by the Police and Statute Labour Committee, or which is by this Act, or shall hereafter in pursuance thereof be, declared to be a public street." Therefore the declaration has still to be made which will make this a public street. Well then, if that be so, is it not a private street? It is constructed; it is a street; and it has been constructed by a private proprietor who must make application to have it declared a public street if this declaration is to be given. But in the meantime the statute says, as your Lordship has pointed out, that "private street" means a street which has not been maintained by the Police and Statute Labour Committee, and is not by this Act declared to be a public street. That appears to me therefore to be the predicament in which this street now stands. It is therefore a street under section 286, which determines the conditions upon which it may be declared public, and the applicant upon whose prayer that may be done. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

Property—Servitude—Building Restriction—Prohibition against building on vacant ground used as a back-green—Whether prohibition affected portion of back-green occupied at date of disposition by a small building not separately conveyed.—By a disposition dated 1866 there was conveyed to A, (first) a tenement of four storeys "with the cellars and outhouses attached, and belonging to the said tenement . . . and the area of ground on which the said tenement, cellars, and outhouses stand," and (second) "the vacant ground situated to the north of the said area of ground . . . which vacant ground is at present occupied by" William Thorburn "as a 'back-green,' but under the following restriction, which was declared to be a real burden affecting the subjects disposed,—"that the said William Thorburn and his foresaids shall not have power to build on the vacant ground or back-green . . . nearer to the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of said vacant ground or back-green than ten feet."

Mar. 4, 1897.
LAWSON v.
WILKIE.

The vacant ground occupied by William Thorburn as a back-green was a well-defined space surrounded on all sides by walls, but at the south-east corner of it and within ten feet of the south boundary wall there were at the date of the disposition two little buildings, each about five feet square and ten feet high. The back-green was on a higher level than the tenement first disposed, and access was had to it from the ground on which the tenement stood by a flight of steps, and by a door in the south wall. The little buildings were removed shortly after 1866.

In 1896 A was proceeding to build on a portion of the back-green which had been occupied by one of the buildings, when B, the proprietor of an adjoining property on the south, who under his title, derived from A's author, was entitled to enforce the restriction in A's title, raised an action to have him interdicted from building on the ground that the proposed building was within ten feet of the south boundary wall.

A maintained that the building restriction affected only the vacant ground conveyed to him, and that the ground occupied at the date of his disposi-

Mar. 4, 1897.
Lawson v.
Wilkie.

After a proof the Court (aff. judgment of Lord Low) granted interdict, holding (1) that the buildings were not outhouses belonging to the tenement, but were adjuncts to the back-green; (2) that being nowhere else dealt with in the disposition they were carried by the conveyance to A of the vacant ground occupied as a back-green, and therefore (3) that the building restriction being commensurate with the subjects so conveyed affected that part of the back-green occupied by the buildings.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

IN 1866 George Lindesay of Feddinch disposed to William Thorburn, baker in Leith, inter alia, "All and Whole that tenement of four storeys, . . . 46 Constitution Street, Leith, with the cellars and outhouses attached and belonging to the said tenement, all as presently occupied by Messrs Cochrane, Paterson, & Company, corn-merchants, and the said William Thorburn, and the area of ground on which the said tenement, cellars, and outhouses stand, and also the vacant ground situated to the north of the said area of ground, and partly behind the same and partly behind the area of ground on which the tenement No. 44 Constitution Street stands, which vacant ground is at present occupied by the said William Thorburn as a back-green, bounded the said subjects . . . on the south . . . partly by the said subjects presently occupied by the said Messrs James Lindesay & Sons. . . But declaring that the subjects hereby disposed are disposed with and under the restrictions and others underwritten, which are hereby declared to be real burdens affecting the said subjects hereby disposed,—that is to say, the said William Thorburn and his foresaids shall not have power to build on the vacant ground or back-green forming part of the subjects hereby disposed nearer to the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of said vacant ground or back-green than ten feet."

At the same time Mr Lindesay disposed to Francis Lindesay the "subjects presently occupied by James Lindesay & Sons," bounded on the north partly by the vacant ground sold to William Thorburn, declaring that Francis Lindesay and his heirs and assignees should be entitled to enforce, inter alia, the building restriction declared to be a real burden on Mr Thorburn's property.

On 22d April 1896 William Lawson, who had come to be proprietor of the subjects disposed to Francis Lindesay, raised an action against George Wilkie, who was in right of the subjects disposed to William Thorburn, concluding, inter alia, (2) for declarator that the defender, in virtue of the provisions contained in the above-mentioned dispositions in favour of William Thorburn and Francis Lindesay, "is debarred from building on the vacant ground or back-green forming part of the subjects disposed by said George Lindesay to the said William Thorburn nearer to the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of said vacant ground or back-green than ten feet, and that a brick wall of twelve feet or thereby in height, forming part of the buildings recently erected by the defender at the back of the premises belonging to him, facing Constitution Street, Leith, is built to the extent of five feet or thereby in length, and of twenty inches or thereby in depth, upon the said vacant ground, and within ten feet from the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of the said vacant ground, or within ten feet of the line occupied by the said north face prior to the recent partial removal by the defender of said wall, and thus constitutes a breach of the provisions contained in the said dispositions"; (3) for interdict against the defender erecting any further buildings on the vacant ground nearer than ten feet from the north face of the south wall; (4) for removal of the buildings already erected; and (5) for damages.

No. 118.
Mar. 4, 1897.
Lawson v.
Wilkie.

The pursuer averred that the defender had recently commenced extensive building operations on the property belonging to him, and had, inter alia, begun to erect a brick wall upon the vacant ground or back-green within ten feet of the north face of the south boundary wall.

The defender admitted that he had begun to erect a brick wall on part of his property, but denied that he was making any encroachment in doing so. "The ground upon which the brick wall complained of is erected was never vacant ground within the meaning of the clause in the disposition in question. Further, at the time when said disposition was granted, there had been erected, ex adverso of the gate at the end of the mutual wall, and within 8½ feet or thereby of part of the north face of the wall, a tool-house, which belonged to the defender's authors. It was not intended by said disposition to affect the right to maintain the said building, or to erect future buildings on the space occupied by said tool-house, or upon any space to the south and east of said tool-house, the sole object of the servitude being to preserve light and air for the yard belonging to the pursuer on the south of the division wall in question."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defender being restricted in the use of the piece of vacant ground specified in the second declaratory conclusion of the summons, to the effect specified in the second declaratory conclusion, and the defender having committed a breach of the said restriction, as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator, interdict, and removal, in terms of the second, third, and fourth conclusions of the summons.

Proof was led. It appeared from the proof that the vacant ground occupied by William Thorburn as a back-green was a well-defined space surrounded on all sides by walls, but at the south-east corner of it and within ten feet of the south boundary wall there were at the date of the disposition two little buildings, each about five feet square and ten feet high. The back-green was on a higher level than the tenement first disposed, and access was had to it from the ground on which the tenement stood by a flight of steps, and by a door in the south wall. The little buildings were removed shortly after 1866. There was also evidence that the small buildings on the back-green were used in connection with it, and were not outhouses connected with the tenement first described in the disposition to Thorburn.

On 4th December 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low), inter alia, found "(1) That the defender is by his titles prohibited from erecting any buildings upon the vacant space or back-green therein mentioned nearer the north face of the wall forming the southern boundary of said vacant space or back-green than ten feet; (2) that the prohibition extended to the portion of the wall at the south-east corner of the said vacant space or back-green in which, prior to the recent operations of the defender, there was a door which gave entrance to the said vacant space or back-green from the premises belonging to the defender fronting Constitution Street, Leith; and (3) that a portion of the brick wall mentioned in the summons, erected by the defender, is nearer the line of the north face of the said wall at the foresaid south-east corner of the said vacant space or back-green than

No. 118. ten feet: Therefore, to the extent and effect of the above findings, finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the second conclusion of the summons," granted interdict against further building, and ordained the removal of the brick wall so far as it was nearer the north face of the south wall than ten feet, and assoilzied the defender from the fifth conclusion of the summons.*

Mar. 4, 1897.
Lawson v.
Wilkie.

* "OPINION.— . . . The defender's property is described as consisting of two parts, first, a tenement of four storeys, 'with the cellars and outhouses attached and belonging to the said tenement . . . and the area of ground on which the said tenement, cellars, and outhouses stand': And, secondly, 'the vacant ground situated to the north of the said area of ground,' and partly behind it and partly behind another property, 'which vacant ground is at present occupied by the said William Thorburn as a back-green.'

"Looking at the plans which have been produced, there does not at first sight appear to be much doubt as to what the subjects are which are referred to in the two branches of the description. Take plan No. 46 of process, which is admitted to be a correct representation of the properties before the defender commenced to build. The vacant space or back-green is there shewn as a perfectly well-defined space, surrounded on all sides by walls, and it answers the description of being partly behind the area of ground described in the first place in the disposition, and partly behind the other property there referred to. It is further not disputed that it is the ground which was occupied by Mr Thorburn as a back-green.

"The clause in the disposition on which the pursuer founds is in the following terms:—'Declaring that the said William Thorburn and his fore-saids shall not have power to build on the vacant ground or back-green forming part of the subjects hereby disposed nearer to the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of said vacant ground or back-green than ten feet, and any building that may be erected on said vacant ground shall not exceed, as regards the south elevation thereof, 18 feet in height from the surface of the ground.'

"Here, again, if the plan only is considered, the area over which the prohibition to build extends does not appear to be doubtful. There is a wall which forms the south boundary of the back-green, and prima facie the continuity of the wall as the boundary is not broken by the fact that there is a door through it at the east end. Nor does the fact that, at the east end, there is a small piece of the defender's ground on the south side of the wall render the wall at that place the less the boundary of the back-green.

"But then the defender says that at the date of the dispositions there were two small buildings in the south-east corner of what is shewn upon the plan (No. 46) as a back-green, and that these buildings did not form part of the back-green, but were outhouses 'belonging to the tenement,' and were among the subjects included in the first branch of the description.

"These two little buildings were spoken to by the witnesses Robert and James Thorburn, who are sons of Mr Thorburn, to whom the defender's property was disposed in 1866. Mr Thorburn was tenant of the property for six years before he bought it, and his sons say that for some years after they went there the houses in the back-green were in existence. The elder brother Robert, although he was only eleven years old when his father bought the property, has a distinct recollection of the houses, and gives a clear, and, I have no doubt, an accurate description of them. They were two little houses standing side by side, about 4 or 5 feet square, and about 10 feet high, built of stone and with a flat stone roof. The door to which I have referred, in the south-east end of the boundary wall of the

Wilkie.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action of declarator, interdict, and damages, founded on the fact that the defender, who is proprietor of two buildings on adjacent areas of his property, is in course of making a communication or covered way from the one block to the other, contrary, as is alleged, to a restriction against building constituted in favour of the pursuer.

The case is not free from difficulty, but after giving my best consideration to the defender's argument, I am satisfied of the soundness of the views expressed in the Lord Ordinary's judgment. The Lord Ordinary has very fully discussed the questions arising on the title-deeds and the evidence, and back-green, gave entrance directly into one of the houses. At what date the houses were removed is not definitely ascertained. Both the Messrs Thorburn think that they were removed soon after their father bought the property, and when he was making some alterations upon the dwelling-house. I think that that was probably the case, but I cannot hold it to be a proved fact in the case that the houses were not removed until after the disposition to Mr Thorburn. In the view which I take of the case, however, that is not material, and I shall assume that the houses were standing at the date of the disposition. Even upon that assumption, however, I cannot regard them as being 'outhouses attached and belonging to the tenement,' and therefore as falling within the first branch of the description and not included in the back-green.

"The little buildings might, no doubt, be described correctly enough as outhouses, but they are not attached to the tenement, nor do I think that they could be properly described as belonging to the tenement, even assuming (what is doubtful) that it is competent to read the words 'attached and belonging,' as if they had been 'attached or belonging.'

"The back-green is not only described in the titles as a separate subject from the tenement, but it is physically a separate subject. The tenement has certain outhouses attached to it, and also an open area or courtyard. The back-green in question is on a higher level than the ground upon which the tenement, with its outhouses and courtyard stands, and access is had to it by a flight of steps which lead from the courtyard to the door in the wall to which I have referred. Further, it is difficult to imagine any purpose connected with the tenement which the little buildings could be intended to serve. When or by whom or for what purpose they were erected cannot be ascertained, but the description given of them by Mr Robert Thorburn, and their situation, suggest that they had been designed to serve some purpose (such, for example, as tool-houses) in connection with the back-green and not with the tenement. If it had been desired to describe the buildings as belonging to any subject, I think that they would have been described as belonging to the back-green.

"But then the defender argued that if the buildings were on the back-green in 1866, it could not be described as an open space, and that therefore the open space referred to must have been the portion of the back-green on which there were no buildings. Now, no doubt if the buildings were in existence, it was not strictly accurate to describe the whole back-green as vacant ground, although as the back-green was of considerable extent and the buildings were very small, and of no value, the inaccuracy of the description was not serious. But further, the subjects are not only described as vacant ground but as vacant ground which 'is at present occupied by the said William Thorburn as a back-green.' Now, what was occupied by Mr

No. 118. I do not propose to elaborate my opinion at the same length, as I should only be repeating what has already been most clearly explained, but I shall indicate my view on what I think is the critical point in the case.

Mar. 4, 1897.
Lawson v.
Wilkie.

The subjects owned by the pursuer and the defender were, until the year 1866, one individual estate, and in that year they were disposed in separate parcels to the pursuer's author, Lindesay, and the defender's author, Thorburn. The defender's property is described as consisting of two parts—first, a tenement of four storeys, “with the cellars and outhouses attached and belonging to the said tenement . . . and the area of ground on which the said tenement, cellars, and outhouses stand”; and secondly, “the vacant ground situated to the north of the said area of ground . . . which vacant ground is at present occupied by the said William Thorburn as a back-green.” The building restriction on which the pursuer founds is in these terms :—“Declaring that the said William Thorburn and his forebears

Thorburn as a back-green was the whole ground, including the little buildings which, if used by him at all, were used as adjuncts to the back-green and not as offices in connection with the tenement. Further, in other parts of the disposition the ground is referred to as ‘said vacant ground or back-green.’ I therefore do not think that the criticism upon the wording of the description is of much weight, and I cannot doubt that the buildings were included in the subjects described in the second place in the disposition.

“I think that the question is to be determined, not by speculations as to the history of the wall, but by the words of the disposition. I have already pointed out that the description of the wall in the clause prohibiting building differs from the description in the clause declaring part of the wall to be mutual. There must have been some reason for that difference, and it is explained, as I have said, by assuming that the wall was to be mutual only as far east as the return wall, but that the prohibition against building extended also to the part of the wall in which the door was. That assumption is entirely consistent with the language used in the clause, and no other assumption appears to me to be so. Further, if I am right in thinking that the description—‘the vacant ground’—refers to the whole back-green, including the part upon which the little buildings stood, then the wall forming the southern boundary of the vacant ground, presumably runs the whole length of the ground. . . .

“I am therefore of opinion that the prohibition extends to the south-east corner of the back-green. The defender has infringed that prohibition by the wall which he has erected. No doubt the infringement is so far very small, but it is admitted that the wall which has been erected is only one side of a proposed porch, which would constitute a substantial infringement of the prohibition. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree so far as regards the infringement. . . .

“The pursuer further concludes for damages. He has put in certain accounts which seem to represent extrajudicial expenses which he has incurred in certain litigations in regard to the properties which he has had with the defender. It is clear that he cannot claim the amount of these accounts as damages in this action. The pursuer further claims damages for the trouble to which he has been put in defending his rights. I never heard of such a claim, which is one which might be put forward by almost every successful litigant. The rule is that everyone is entitled to maintain and defend what he believes to be his legal rights, and unless in the case of an action being brought maliciously and without probable cause, an unsuccessful litigant is liable in no further damages than the expenses of process.”

shall not have power to build on the vacant ground or back-green forming part of the subjects hereby disposed nearer to the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of said vacant ground or back-green than ten feet." There is also a restriction as to the height of the building which may be erected on the back-green, with which we are not directly concerned.

No. 118.
Mar. 4, 1897.
Lawson v.
Wilkie.

Whatever may be the true interpretation of the clause of restriction, I think that the expressions "vacant ground" and "back-green" which are used in the dispositive clause, and also in the clause of restriction, must apply to one and the same physical subject. It is, I think, a safe and universally applicable rule of construction that descriptive words must be taken to have the same meaning wherever they are used without qualification in different parts of the same deed. Now, I think there is not much difficulty in ascertaining what was the subject conveyed under the name of "vacant ground" occupied by Thorburn as a back-green. The Lord Ordinary, referring to the plan No. 46 of process, which is admitted to be a correct representation of the properties, observes:—"The vacant space or back-green is there shewn as a perfectly well-defined space, surrounded on all sides by walls, and it answers the description of being partly behind the area of ground described in the first place in the disposition, and partly behind the other property there referred to. It is further not disputed that it is the ground which was occupied by Mr Thorburn as a back-green." I do not understand that this statement of the Lord Ordinary is disputed. In any case it seems to be perfectly clear that the property conveyed is the entire space enclosed by the walls surrounding the back-green. That being so, I must hold that the prohibition against building within ten feet of the north face of the wall forming the south boundary of the vacant ground also applies to the whole contained area. The argument for the defender on this part of the case depends on the fact that at the date of the disposition there were two small buildings in the south-east corner of the back-green, and that the area occupied by these buildings cannot be properly described as vacant ground. It is suggested that these buildings are covered by the words of the first description, which conveys, inter alia, outhouses "belonging to the tenement," and in any case it is said that the area occupied by these buildings is not "vacant ground," and that their site ought to be taken to be excepted from the building restriction.

Now, it may be that if there was no better title to the land occupied by the two small buildings, these might be covered by the expression "outhouses belonging to the tenement." But this observation does not carry very far. The buildings are undoubtedly within the area described as the vacant ground in use as a back-green, and the small buildings are not excepted from the conveyance of the back-green.

The argument, then, comes to this, that in so far as a fractional part of the back-green is occupied by such buildings, it is not correctly described as vacant ground. But when so put the argument does not impress me, because it only amounts to this, that the description, although sufficient for the purposes of identification, is not strictly accurate. But it is not easy to frame a description of heritable subjects which is not open to criticism from the point of view of strict accuracy, and accordingly it has been recognised that a description of lands is sufficient if it identifies the

No. 118. property as a whole, although there may be features which are not noticed in it. Supposing that the subjects first and second described in Mr Thorburn's title had been sold to separate purchasers, can it be doubted that a conveyance of the vacant ground occupied as a back-green would carry any buildings upon it which were not of sufficient importance to be treated as separate tenements? This consideration, in my opinion, suffices for the disposal of the case so far as the argument depends on the use of the words "vacant ground." Because when it is once ascertained that the words of conveyance include the small buildings, it follows that the building restriction must receive an equivalent interpretation. The descriptive words are the same and the motive is the same, because I cannot conceive of any reason for a restriction of the right of building which should not apply to the whole length of the proposed building line.

Mar. 4, 1897.
Lawson v.
Wilkie.

A separate argument was maintained regarding the use of the word "wall" in the building restriction, viz., that "wall" does not include door. I shall not repeat the Lord Ordinary's answer, which to my mind is perfectly convincing, and to which I have really nothing to add.

On both points, I would observe that while in theory restrictions on the use of property are subject to a strict interpretation, this rule, like all sensible rules of law or criticism, has relation to substance rather than to form. For example, a prohibition against erecting shops or warehouses would not be extended so as to apply to dwelling-houses. But when we consider the meaning of descriptive words, these, I think, must receive a true and reasonable interpretation according to the ordinary use of language, whether the description is contained in a disposition or grant, or in a clause qualifying the grant or restricting the use of the subject. I move your Lordships to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am satisfied with Lord M'Laren's judgment.

The difficulty which had presented itself very strongly to my mind was this: The title in imposing this prohibition seems to make a direct appeal to the state of possession by William Thorburn in 1866, and to apply this prohibition solely to what, according to William Thorburn's occupation, was vacant ground or back-green. Now, in point of fact, in 1866, I think it is proved that this was not vacant ground, because it was covered by a building of stone not of a temporary character, and the same reason makes it extremely difficult for me, as it does for Lord M'Laren, to apply the words vacant ground or back-green to the inside of a stone building. But Lord M'Laren has, I think, satisfactorily met that difficulty by reasoning in which your Lordships concur, and I accordingly consent to the judgment proposed.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note.

THE MELROSE DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF ROXBURGH, Second Parties.—A. J. Young.

Mar. 5, 1897.
County Council of County of Roxburgh v. Melrose District Committee.

Process—Special Case—Competency.—A special case was presented by a County Council, as first parties, and a District Committee of the County Council, as second parties, to determine the question whether an assessment should be levied from the whole county or only from the district. The Court, ex proprio motu, dismissed the case as incompetent, in respect that the District Committee, not being concerned with the payment of rates, had no interest or title to appear.

BY a resolution of the County Council of Roxburgh passed in 1ST DIVISION. October 1894, it was determined that any assessment for the rebuilding of certain bridges within the county, of which Melrose Bridge was one, should be levied from the whole county.

The side walls of Melrose Bridge having shewn signs of weakness, the Melrose District Committee employed Mr Westland, C.E., to examine the bridge, and report.

Mr Westland thereafter reported that to put the bridge into a satisfactory state very considerable works would require to be executed upon it.

Thereafter the County Council found that the works recommended by Mr Westland did not amount to rebuilding the bridge. As the result of this finding would have been to throw upon the Melrose district the cost of repairing the bridge, the Melrose District Committee declined to acquiesce in this finding, and maintained that the work that was necessary would amount to rebuilding the bridge.

In order to settle the question, a special case was presented by the County Council of the county of Roxburgh, of the first part, and the Melrose District Committee, of the second part.

After a narrative of the foregoing facts, the following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—“(1) Do the operations set forth by Mr Westland in his said reports amount to a ‘rebuilding’ of Melrose Bridge, within the meaning of section 58 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and section 3 of the Roads and Bridges Amendment Act, 1892,* to be provided for by an assessment under the said sections of the said statutes? (2) Are the said operations to be regarded as of the nature of ‘maintenance’ or ‘repair’ of the said bridge, within the meaning of the said statutes, and as such to be provided for by an assessment under section 52 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878?”

At the hearing a doubt was expressed by the Court as to the title of the District Committee to appear.

Counsel for the parties argued that it had a title; that the question really was whether the action of the County Council was ultra vires, and that the District Committee was entitled to be heard to plead that it was.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the special case will do.

The District Committee has administrative duties, but it is not a contri-

It is no part of our duty to suggest other people who might competently raise the question, but the statements of the case would point to the rate-payers.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that there may be persons with a good title and interest to raise this question, but it has not been shewn that the District Committee have any. Accordingly, we can no more entertain a special case between that committee and the other party than we could hear an action raised at the instance of a party who has no title to sue.

THE COURT dismissed the case.

Mar. 5, 1897.
Arizona Copper Co., Limited, v. London Scottish American Trust, Limited.

Interest—Agreement to pay share of profits to trustee as a sinking fund to secure debentures—Interest of sinking fund.—A company by an agreement entered into with a trustee for future debenture-holders became bound each year "to accumulate as a sinking fund in the hands of" the trustee a proportion of its free annual profits for securing and paying the debentures, the trustee being authorised to invest the trust funds in his hands from time to time. Held that the interest derived from the funds so invested by the trustee did not fall to be credited to the company as part of its annual profits, but that the trustee was bound to accumulate it with the funds forming the sinking fund.

1ST DIVISION. ON 1st October 1894 an assignment, agreement, and declarator of trust was entered into between the Arizona Copper Company, Limited, of the first part, and the London Scottish American Trust, Limited, of the second part.

The agreement proceeded on the narrative that the Arizona Company contemplated raising money by the issue of (1) terminable debentures to the amount of £100,000; (2) A debenture stock to the amount of £135,000; and (3) B debenture stock, to the amount of £181,300, these securities to be charges in their order upon the property and assets conveyed to the Trust Company.

The agreement, inter alia, provided,—“(Fourth) For the better securing of the debts and obligations hereinafter set out, the first party hereby undertakes, each year after the year ending on 30th September 1894, to accumulate as a sinking fund in the hands of the second party 25 per cent of its free annual profits remaining, after satisfaction of the interests called for in terms of the several obligations set out in article fifth hereof . . . And it is hereby provided and declared that the first party may either pay the said accumulations in cash or by delivery to the second party of its terminable debentures of the class hereby secured, which, having been issued by the first party for cash, have been duly paid to and discharged by the holders thereof, accompanied by a certificate and affidavit by the first party's secretary that the same have been bona fide met and paid by the company, and that no others have been issued in lieu and place thereof. The second party shall be bound to apply any sums of cash coming into its hands in terms of this article, in redeeming any terminable debentures of the first party which may for the time being be past due (it being in contemplation to issue debentures payable at different dates), but it shall not be competent to the second party to apply the funds coming into its hands in terms of this section in payment of interest on debentures, but only in payment of the principal sum thereof . . . (Fifth) It is hereby declared that the second party holds the said securities and sinking fund, subject to the trusts at present affecting the same until such trusts are validly discharged, in trust for the following purposes: Primo loco, for securing and paying all debts, claims, and expenses which may be incurred by it in executing the office of trustee . . . secundo loco . . . for securing and paying to the holders thereof the whole of the terminable debentures of the first party . . . with the interest from time to time due thereon at dates when the same becomes due . . . tertio loco . . . for securing and paying to the parties for the time being in right of the obligations of the first party undertaken in respect of the A debenture stock of the first party sums not exceeding in all £135,000, with interest thereon . . . quarto loco . . . for securing and paying to the parties for the time being in right of the obligations of the first party undertaken in respect of the B debenture stock . . . and quinto loco, after satisfying the whole of said purposes in their respective orders, the second party shall hold the said securities for the first party, or their assignees, and the said sinking fund shall thereupon cease to be accumulated . . . (Thirty-fourth) The trustees may lend out or invest the trust funds in their hands from time to time, or any part thereof, on heritable security, or in or upon the stocks, shares, debentures, or deposit-receipts, or other securities . . . as they in their sole discretion may think proper, and may from time to time at their discretion vary any such investment or security. Further, it is hereby provided and declared that while any of the said terminable debentures remain unpaid, the second party may invest any of the funds in its hands other than the sums paid in advance of calls on the A preference shares of the first party in the purchase or redemption at or below par of the said terminable debentures or any portion thereof. After the whole of the said terminable debentures have been redeemed the second party may invest the whole or any portion of the funds in its hands, other than as aforesaid, in the purchase or redemption at or below ten per cent premium of the whole or any portion of the A debenture stock. After the said debentures and A debenture stock have been paid off, the second party may invest the whole or any portion of the funds in its hands, other than as aforesaid, in the purchase or redemption at or below par of the B debenture stock, or any portion thereof."

The Arizona Company made payment from time to time of various sums to account of the sinking fund, in conformity with article fourth of the agreement, and the same having been invested by the Trust Company in sundry stocks and shares, in terms of said article thirty-fourth, the latter received and had in its hands considerable sums of interest thereon. The amount of the free profits falling to the sinking fund for the first year was nearly £12,000.

A question having arisen between the two companies as to the

Arizona
Copper Co.,
Limited, v.
London

The foregoing agreement, and the facts above stated, were set out in the case, and the following question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"Is the first party, in ascertaining and settling the proportion of their free annual profits payable to the second party in terms of the fourth article of the said assignation, agreement, and declaration of trust, entitled to credit for the amount of the income collected by the second party and arising on sums previously paid to the second party by the first party in terms of said fourth article, and forming the sinking fund for the time? or is the second party bound to retain such income and accumulate it with the other funds forming the sinking fund for the time, to be applied as provided in the said assignation, agreement, and declaration of trust?"

Argued for the first party;—The income derived from the investments of the sinking fund in the hands of the second party formed part of the income of the first party, and the first party were bound to take the same into account in determining the free annual profits, 25 per cent of which was payable to the second party, and the second party was bound to give credit for it as a payment from profits. The fourth article of the agreement conferred on the first party the option of satisfying the stipulated payment on account of the sinking fund by delivery of terminable debentures duly paid to and discharged by the holders thereof, or by payment of cash. If the payment were satisfied by delivery of such debentures, these being discharged would not carry interest, and the cesser of interest would wholly ensure to the increase of the free annual profits of the first party, and only 25 per cent of the resulting increase of these profits would be included in the proportion of the free annual profits falling to be paid on account of the sinking fund. If, on the other hand, the payment were made in cash and invested by the second party, and the whole income therefrom retained by the second party as part of the sinking fund over and above the proportion of the free annual profits, the amount accumulated would be increased, while the income and free annual profits of the first party would remain the same. That was not a reasonable result. The presumption was in favour of the two modes of satisfying the payment on account of the sinking fund leading to the same results, and therefore the Copper Company was entitled to get credit for the income whether it was derived from funds in the hands of the second party or arising from the cancellation of its own interest-bearing obligations.

Argued for the second party;—The income of the funds forming the sinking fund for the time fell to be accumulated with and added to the sinking fund, and applied to the purposes set forth in the trust-deed. There was nothing in the agreement to suggest that the interest received on money in the hands of, and invested by, the second, was to be handed over to the first party.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this special case relates to the interest of moneys which have already been impressed into the hands of the second party, and the contention on behalf of the company is that, although those interests are received by, and are in the hands of the second party, yet the company is entitled to treat those interests as forming part of their free annual profits. I do not think that a complete statement of the question, No. 120. because the words which are operative, as regards the obligation of the company, do not merely say that certain things shall be done about the annual profits, or rather, I should say, about a proportion of the annual profits, but they say that the company shall accumulate, as a sinking fund, year by year, 25 per cent of its free annual profits. I think those words clearly shew that the moneys which are being dealt with are moneys which, apart from stipulation, the company might accumulate, or might do something else with,—in fact, that they are moneys which are in the hands of the company.

Mar. 5, 1897.
Arizona
Copper Co.,
Limited, v.
London
Scottish American Trust,

But the moneys now in question are not in the hands of the company. They are interests which, according to the scheme of this deed, are received and drawn by the second parties. That is the necessary consequence of the provision that the capital sum constituted by 25 per cent of each year's annual profits is impressed in the hands of the second party. But the contract is more clear and careful than that, because it prescribes the duties of the second party. They are to lend out and invest what is in their hands, and they, of course, are to draw in and retain the proceeds of those investments. Now, the 5th clause of the contract tells what is to be done with those moneys which are, under the contract, in the hands of the second party; and among the moneys which, according to the scheme of the contract, are in the hands of the second party are those very interests which we are dealing with. Now, if the intention of the agreement were that those interests, which, as I have pointed out, are lawfully drawn in and taken into the hands of the second party, were to find their way back for the purposes of the agreement into the profits of the first party, I think that would have been said. It is not said, and accordingly, I think it must be held that the interests remain separated, by the working out of the agreement, from the profits, and are still in the hands of the second party, and necessarily applicable solely to the trust purposes specified in the fifth article. That being so, I confess I do not think it possible that the first party can accumulate moneys which are not in their hands to accumulate or not to accumulate. Accordingly, on that ground, I think the contention of the second party is to be preferred.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The first parties are bound to accumulate as a sinking fund, in the hands of the second parties, 25 per cent of their full annual profits, or the whole if less than £5000, by paying over that amount to them as trustees. The money so accumulated is to be disposed of in accordance with the directions in the trust-deed. Now, nothing is said specially in the deed as to what the trustees are to do with the interest of the money thus paid. Accordingly, the ordinary rule being that interest follows the principal, if the principal is dedicated to some special purpose, it follows that the interest must go with it, and on this brief ground I agree with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—It must be admitted that in this contract there is no direction to the trustees to accumulate the money which is paid into their hands. The word accumulate is used only in a secondary sense to express the payment of annual contributions by the first party, the Arizona Copper Company, into a sinking fund which is placed under the control of trustees.

That can mean nothing more than an addition every year to the heap already in their hands. But this does not go very far to solve the question before us, for when we come to the clauses which express the conditions on which the trustees are to hold the fund, there is in clause 34, if not an express direction, a plain implication that the trustees are as a matter of duty to invest the money received by them under the agreement. The securities on which they may invest the trust funds are specified, and it is obvious that it would not be good trust management to take money and then to let it lie in bank until an opportunity arose of paying off debentures. Therefore I take it that after investment, and when the money has become an income-producing fund the income is as truly trust-estate as the capital. On a sound construction of clause 5, which specifies the purposes of the trust, this must be held to cover trust money derived from income as well as the capital received by direct contribution from the shareholders. Now, these trust purposes are quite explicit, and amount to this, that the whole money is to be applied to payment of the creditors' claims according to the order of their securities,—first the holders of terminable debentures, then of A debentures, and thirdly of B debentures. The money being thus appropriated, it is impossible that it can also be considered as profits of the company out of which further contributions are to be paid to the sinking fund. Profits are limited on construction to profits directly made by the company, and do not include money which in a sense is the company's, but which is in the hands of trustees appropriated to specific purposes.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first branch of the query in the negative, and the second or alternative branch in the affirmative, and decern: Find the first parties liable in expenses as between agent and client."

Police—Assessments—Resolution to apply assessments to expenses of opposing bills in Parliament—Appeal—Competency—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), sec. 339.—Sec. 339 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892 (being one of the sections included in Part IV. Police Administration), enacts that "any person liable to pay or to contribute towards the expense of any work ordered or required by the Commissioners under this Act, and any person whose property may be affected, or who thinks himself aggrieved by any order or resolution or deliverance, or act of the Commissioners made or done under any of the provisions herein contained, may, unless otherwise in this Act specially provided, appeal either to the Sheriff or to the Court of Session."

Police Commissioners passed a resolution to charge the expenditure incurred by them in opposing a private bill in Parliament to the Public Health Assessment. A ratepayer appealed under sec. 339 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, on the ground that the resolution was ultra vires. Appeal dismissed as incompetent.

Observed that a ratepayer might raise the question by declarator.

AT a meeting of the Magistrates and Council of Leith, as Commissioners of Police for the burgh, held on 6th October 1896, they resolved to charge (1) the expenses incurred by them in their opposition to the Edinburgh Extension Bill, which had for its object the annexation of Leith to Edinburgh, to the Public Health Assessment; and (2) the expenses incurred by them in their opposition to the Edinburgh Improvement and Tramways Bill, and the Edinburgh Street Tramway Company's Bill, to the Burgh General Assessment, the expenses to be spread over a period of five years.

James Heddle, a ratepayer in Leith, lodged an appeal under section 340 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to the Magistrates and Council of Leith, against the assessments. The appeal was unanimously dismissed.

Heddle thereupon presented an appeal to the Second Division of the Court of Session, in which he averred;—(20) “That the appellant considers himself aggrieved by the aforesaid resolutions of 6th October 1896 to charge to any assessment or rate, as condescended on by the respondents, the expenses incurred in opposing or promoting the above-mentioned three bills, and now appeals against the aforementioned resolutions, deliverance, or judgment, and statement aforesaid, in virtue of section 339 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,* the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, and to the extent, if any, that the said appeal may be found to be justified at common law, for the reasons above stated, and for other reasons to be stated at the hearing of the appeal.”

He prayed the Court “to recall the judgment, decision, or deliverance aforesaid simpliciter, and to require and ordain the respondents to withdraw and exclude from the statutory estimates and assessments the sums complained of; and to ordain that, inasmuch as the assessments for the year now current are in course of being levied, and the sums complained of in whole or in part paid, the respondents

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), in Part IV. of the Act, commencing with section 99 and ending with section 339, deals with “Police administration.”

 Heddlie v.
 Magistrates of Leith.

The Magistrates and Council of Leith, as Police Commissioners and as Local Authority, lodged answers.

The answer to article 20 was,—“ Explained that the appellant is not a person aggrieved by the foresaid resolutions of 6th October 1896 within the meaning of said section, so as to entitle him to appeal these said resolutions, and the present petition is therefore incompetent. Further, the appellant has neither title nor interest to maintain the present appeal, and the prayer of his petition is incompetent.”

Argued for the respondents;—Section 339 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, had no application to the facts which the appellant desired to bring before the notice of the Court. Occurring as it did in Part IV. of the Act, it only applied to police administration. It had no connection with rating and borrowing, which were dealt with in Part V. of the Act. The remedy of a ratepayer who objected to a resolution of the Commissioners to impose an assessment as illegal was an action of interdict or of declarator and interdict.

Argued for the appellant;—Section 339 was broad in its terms, and gave the right of appeal to any person who thought himself aggrieved by an order or resolution of the Commissioners. The respondents’ objection was a technical one, and should not be given effect to.¹

LORD YOUNG.—We have been told, and I think quite accurately, that there is no previous instance of an appeal resembling this. An appeal against the resolution of the proper authority as to what they will assess for is without precedent, and prima facie it looks an incompetent way of bringing under the consideration of this Court the question whether the Magistrates are entitled either to raise by assessment a fund in order to meet such charges as those which are here in question or out of the proceeds of an assessment laid on to take money to pay these charges.

Now, it is certainly a matter of interest and importance to have it decided whether or no the police authority here—the Magistrates and Town-council—are entitled to raise by assessment funds to meet such charges as are here in question, or to take money out of the proceeds of an assessment in order to meet them, and if there is a dispute as to that question it is very proper that it should be brought before the Court for determination. But to bring it before the Court by appeal against a resolution to raise an assessment, which contains, I assume, some statement indicating that they had in view these charges in fixing the amount of the assessment to be raised—to say that that could be brought under the consideration of the Court by appeal at the instance of any individual ratepayer—is a proposition for which I would require some authority.

If clause 339 of the Police Act were, upon the face of it, plainly an authority for that, it would of course be sufficient, but I incline to think that it is not, and that the proper way to raise the question—the way to which the burgh authority assent—is by declarator and interdict, or declarator without any interdict, because we have no reason to suppose that the burgh authority would act against a judgment of this Court—either not appealed against or confirmed upon appeal—finding what was the law, and consequently their duty in the matter. Therefore I think it would not be the proper course to proceed in this appeal to try that question, as I think it is not properly brought before us by the appeal.

Heddle v.
Leith.

I think the proper case for appeal under the section is, where any individual under the jurisdiction of the police authority suffers in his person or property by any proceeding of theirs under the Act. He may appeal with respect to any assessment imposed upon him, and say,—“That is more than my share; I complain against the assessment so far as I am concerned; you have overrated my premises, or I am not the party that is liable in respect of the premises for which you have assessed me.” All those are individual things which he may bring forward individually by appeal to the Sheriff or by appeal to this Court. But a general question, such as the right of a public authority to apply funds raised by assessment, either under the Burgh Act or under the Public Health Act, to certain purposes, or to take funds out of the proceeds of an assessment previously imposed for these purposes, is, I think, not conveniently, and certainly in my opinion not competently, brought before us by appeal. I am therefore, upon the whole matter, of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed as incompetent.

LORD TRAYNER—The question that the appellant really desires to have determined is plainly enough brought out in the statement of facts in the appeal, and is an important enough question, and upon the mere question of technicality of form, I would not have been without a desire to aid the appellant in having it settled without putting him to the expense of bringing another action if that could have been done. But the important question which is raised, as I say, on his statement, is not the question which he asks us to determine in the prayer of the appeal. The prayer of his appeal contains several clauses. The first part of it—and upon the success of which all the other parts of the prayer depend—runs thus: It asks us “to recall the judgment, decision, or deliverance aforesaid simpliciter.” Now, the only judgment, decision, or deliverance referred to in the appeal is the judgment of the Magistrates and Council themselves upon an appeal which Mr Heddle took against an assessment which has been made and imposed upon him individually. That was an appeal which he took under section 340 of the Burgh Police Act—an appeal which is there specially provided for. He does not ask us to review that decision, and I doubt very much whether we would have any competency to review that decision. But he asks us to recall it as a means of enabling him to get into the general question, which, as I have already indicated, plainly could not give him the remedies and relief that he prays for in this prayer.

I rather think that the section on which he bases his right of appeal—the 339th—although it is exceedingly broad in its terms, has no reference to the case we are dealing with, and certainly is not a section under which the question that Mr Heddle wants to have determined can be brought up. Therefore if the first part of this prayer is refused, necessarily the whole of

No. 121. it follows, and upon that ground I agree in the judgment which Lord Young has proposed,—that this appeal ought to be dismissed. There is a remedy open to Mr Heddle, as he well knows—a form of process—in which the question he wants to have settled can be raised and determined, and if Mr Heddle persists in trying the question, he must do it in the form which the Court has provided. This is not such a form, and therefore I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Succession—Vesting—Payment—Discretion of trustees.—A testatrix by her trust-deed directed her trustees to pay twelve months after her death the residue of her estate to her four children nominatim, equally, and declared that should any child die “before the said residue becomes payable” his share should go to his issue, and failing such to the survivors or survivor of the other three children. A codicil added some years later bore:—“I desire that the portion falling to my son W. should not be handed over to his own care, but that he should only draw from my trustees the interest thereon weekly. If, however, at any time my trustees consider it would be for his true benefit to hand over to himself what might then be his share, I hereby empower them to do so.” The trustees paid to W from his share certain capital sums, but refused to make further payments of capital.

In a question between the trustees and a creditor of W who had used arrestments in their hands, held that no part of the capital of W's share had vested in him except the sums paid to him by the trustees.

MRS MARY BELL, Glasgow, died leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 2d September 1870 with codicil thereto, dated 30th August 1880, both recorded 18th September 1880. By her settlement she left her whole estate to a trustee, and directed—“In the third place, on the death of the said Jeremiah M. Bell [her husband] should he survive me, but should he predecease me, then within twelve months after my death, my said trustee shall pay over the residue and remainder of my means and estate . . . to and in favour of my four children—Amelia Agnes Bell, Adelaide Mary Bell, Mary Hutcheson Bell, and William James Bell, share and share alike, the shares payable to my daughters shall be payable exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands they may marry, and shall not be liable for the debts or deeds of their husbands, and in the event of the death of any one or more of my said children before the said residue becomes payable, the share which would have been payable to such deceiver shall accresce and belong to his, her, or their lawful children, share and share alike, and should any one or more of my said children die without leaving lawful issue, the share which would have been payable to such deceiver shall fall to and be payable to the survivors in equal shares, and in the event of there being only one of them surviving, the other three having predeceased without leaving lawful issue, the whole of said residue shall be payable to such survivor." The codicil was as follows:—"I desire that the portion falling to my son, Wm. James Bell, should not be handed over to his own care, but that he should only draw from my trustees the interest thereon weekly. If, however, at any time my trustees consider it would be for his true benefit to hand over to himself what might then be his share, I hereby empower them to do so."

Mrs Bell survived her husband.

The trustees retained William James Bell's share of the residue, but in the exercise of their discretionary power they made certain advances of capital to him in 1885 and in 1887. Since that date the trustees refused to make further payments of capital.

In 1892 John Gordon Russell obtained decree in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against William James Bell, and having arrested his share of the residue in the hands of the trustees, he raised in 1893 this action of furthcoming against the trustees.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The interest of the common debtor in the estate alleged to be arrested is by the clause in the codicil quoted in the first article of this statement of facts purely alimentary, is so held by the trustees for his behoof, and is not assignable by him, nor arrestable nor attachable for his debts or deeds.

On 29th January 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), found that the funds in the hands of the trustees were not arrestable.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Berry), who on 20th November 1896 adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—An absolute right of fee in the share of his mother's estate was conferred on Bell, vesting a morte testatoris, and vesting was not affected by the provisions for survivors, these not being destinations over.¹ The words "before the said residue becomes payable" were not effectual to postpone vesting.² If a right of fee vesting a morte were conferred by the words of gift, mere words of restriction either in the same deed or a codicil were not effectual to limit the fee, and the limitation would be regarded as repugnant, unless there was an actual revocation of the fee, or a provision conferring the fee, or at least a power to the trustees to confer the fee, on a new line of fiars.³ This element was absent. There was no revocation in the deed, and the codicil did not disclose a revocation, or gift of fee, or power to the trustees to reconfer the fee. Accordingly the trustees could be forced to pay the capital to Bell, and still more clearly to his creditors.¹ The cases relied on by the respondents were distinguishable. In *Chambers*² the trustees had power to settle the fee on a new line of fiars. In *White*³ if the trustees withheld payment of capital the fee was conferred on the children of the beneficiary. It was clear that ulterior destination of the fee was essential if the original gift of fee was to be affected. A mere discretionary power was not enough.

Argued for the respondents;—There was no vesting a morte or indeed till actual payment, and in terms of the deed payment was in the absolute discretion of the trustees. As Bell's right was therefore dependent on an exercise of discretion, nothing vested till that occurred.⁴ Besides the survivorship clause referred to the period of payment, and this postponed vesting till payment. *Chambers' Trustees*² ruled this case. Here, as in Chambers' Trustees,² it was clear that the exercise of the power was an inherent condition of the gift until it was actually made, and thus the discretionary power suspended vesting. Here also (and this was a fortiori of *Chambers' Trustees*²) the restriction was in the codicil, which shewed second thoughts on the part of the testatrix. There was no conflict between *Chambers' Trustees*² and subsequent cases in the Court of Session. They were reconcilable. A gift of fee, subject to the exercise of a discretionary power by trustees, did not vest till payment, or at most only vested subject to defeasance by them at any time before payment, e.g., in *Chambers' Trustees*²; but where there was an absolute gift of fee on one hand, and an attempt to restrict it on the other, mere words of restriction would be regarded as creating repugnancy, and as ineffectual to prevent vesting, e.g., in Miller's Trustees.⁵ The case of *Greenlees*⁶ was held to present an absolute gift of fee fully vested. A contrast to this was Muir's Trustees.⁷ In *Ritchie's Trustees*⁸ vesting was clear, and the directions to trustees were only administrative provisions. In *Wilkie's Trustees*¹ it was clear that vesting had taken place, and so the Court disregarded mere provisions as to postponement of payment. In Mackinnon's Trustees,¹ the fee was to vest at twenty-five, and the trustees were not entitled to retain after the beneficiary reached that age. In *Lawson's Trustees*⁹ vesting was clear, otherwise there would have been intestacy. *Duthie's Trustees*¹⁰ was a pure case of conferring an absolute fee and attempting to restrict it, with the result of creating repugnancy. But all these cases were distinct from the present. There was no vesting, and no intestacy would ensue if this conclusion were come to, because by the will any part of his share unpaid to Bell at his death would go to his issue or his sisters, and the survivors. But if these cases were similar to the present, and were inconsistent with Chambers' Trustees,¹ the latter must prevail as a higher authority. Lord Hatherley in Chambers' Trustees was even of opinion that if there had been vesting it might be recalled when the trustees determined to pay no more of the capital. On the deeds the clear intention of the testatrix was in the direction taken by the trustees.

Russell v.
Bell's
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD MONCREIFF.—In this action of furthcoming the pursuer, a creditor of William James Bell, having obtained a decree against the latter for £276, 1s. 9d., called upon the testamentary trustees of Bell's mother to make forthcoming to him out of the funds in their hands a sum sufficient to satisfy the debt.

The defence which the Sheriffs have sustained is that the funds in the trustees' hands are not in the circumstances arrestable, no absolute right of fee in the capital of the share in which he is interested having vested in William James Bell.

I think the question we have to decide is one of very great difficulty, the difficulty arising, not from any doubt as to the truster's intention, but from the course of recent decisions to which we were referred. Although with considerable hesitation, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is sound, and should be affirmed, because I am satisfied that no absolute right to the capital of the share in question, in so far as not yet paid over, is vested in William James Bell, and that accordingly the trustees are not bound to make the balance of that share still in their hands forthcoming to the pursuer.

Under Mrs Bell's settlement of 2d September 1870, had it stood alone, right to a share of the residue would have vested in William J. Bell on the death of his mother, if—as I understand was the case—she survived her husband. The scheme of the settlement was that the shares of residue should be payable at the death of the longest liver of the spouses, but that if any of the children should die before the residue became payable, their share should go to their lawful children, and failing children to the survivors of the immediate children of the truster. The effect of this, I take it, was to suspend vesting until the time fixed for payment.

But ten years after the execution of the settlement, viz., on 30th August 1880, the truster having apparently become satisfied that her son William was not fit to be entrusted with the share of residue destined to him, executed a codicil which materially altered the original will as regarded his share. That codicil is very shortly expressed, and was evidently not prepared by a law-agent, but its meaning is sufficiently clear. The first and leading direction is as follows:—"I desire that the portion falling to my son, William James Bell, should not be handed over to his own care, but that he should only draw from my trustees the interest thereon weekly." This I read as a virtual revocation of the direction in the will that a share of residue should be paid to her son William if alive at her death. She now

No. 122. directs that it shall not be paid to him, but that he shall only draw the interest weekly.

Mar. 5, 1897.
Russell v.
Bell's
Trustees.

Following upon this direction power is given to the trustees in certain circumstances to pay over to him the capital of his share. It is thus expressed,—“If, however, at any time my trustees consider it would be for his true benefit to hand over to himself what might then be his share, I hereby empower them to do so.”

The question which we have to decide is, whether the directions contained in the codicil operate suspension of vesting, which would otherwise have taken place, or whether they are merely an ineffectual attempt to annex restrictions to a fully vested right of fee. I am of opinion that the former is their true character and effect—that in virtue of those directions the trustees, if they think fit, are entitled to withhold payment of the capital during the whole of William's life, and that until they actually pay it over to him he has no vested right in it. I sympathise with the Sheriff-substitute in his perplexity as to which class of decisions he should follow. But I am of opinion that this case belongs to the class of which Smiths v. Chambers' Trustees,¹ a decision of the House of Lords, is the leading example, and that the judgment appealed against does not necessarily conflict at least with the principle upon which the cases of Miller's Trustees,² Wilkie's Trustees,³ and *Greenlees' Trustees*⁴ were decided.

The case of *Smiths v. Chambers' Trustees*¹ seems to be directly in point. By the last purpose of his settlement Dr Chambers directed, as to the residue of his estate, that it should be paid and conveyed to the children of the marriage equally among them (with the exception of one son, William Chambers) “and with and under the exceptions and modifications to be afterwards stated.” The shares were to be payable six months after his decease in the case of such children as were major, and it was declared that the whole provisions in favour of his children should vest in those surviving him on his death. Then came the following discretionary powers which were conferred upon his trustees,⁵—“And notwithstanding the periods above appointed for the payment of the shares of the residue of my means and estate, I provide and declare that it shall be lawful to and in the power and option of my trustees, if they see cause and deem it fit, to postpone as long as they shall think it expedient to do so, the payment of the provisions or shares of residue hereinbefore provided as aforesaid in the case of all or any of my children . . . and to apply the interest or annual produce of the same during the period of the postponement to or for behoof of such children . . . or by a deed under their hands to retain the said provisions or any of them vested in their own persons, or to vest the same in the persons of other trustees (whom they are hereby authorised to appoint) . . . so that my children, or any of them, as the case may be, may draw and receive only the interests or other annual proceeds of their respective provisions during their joint lives, or for such time as my trustees may fix, and that the capital may be settled on or for behoof of such children . . . and their lawful issue, on such conditions and under such restrictions and limitations and for such uses as my trustees in their discretion may deem most expedient, of which expediency and the time and manner of exercising the powers and option hereby given they shall be the sole and final judges." No. 122.

While part of the share of James Chambers, one of the trustor's sons, was still in the hands of the trustees it was arrested by his creditors, but founding on the powers conferred upon them the trustees refused to pay it over and resolved (after litiſcontestation) to pay James Chambers the interest only. Lord Young, who was Lord Ordinary, held that under this deed the provision in favour of James was subject to modification by the trustees in exercise of the powers conferred upon them, and that the declaration as to vesting was equally dependent upon the exercise of those powers. He accordingly held that it was within the powers of the trustees to retain the share of residue falling to James Chambers, and employ the interest of the same as an alimentary fund for his behoof. The Inner-House, by a majority, recalled this judgment, holding that the clause of modification imported merely a resolute condition, and that the creditor's arrestment having been laid on prior to the purification of the condition, attached the fund. Lord Shand dissented, holding that the condition suspended vesting, that there was no vesting of an absolute and unconditional right, and that the trustees might, at their discretion, postpone payment and restrict the interest of James to a liferent.

The House of Lords reversed the decision of the Court of Session, holding that the trustees were entitled to withhold payment of the capital and apply it for behoof of the legatees in such manner and at such time as they thought fit.

The learned Lords regarded the interest of the beneficiary as a qualified or conditional fee. Lord Hatherley says,—“Stopping here, we find a power in the trustees overruling all directions for payment and vesting before given, and directing them during postponement to apply the interest for behoof of the children. This must mean that the child is to have no control over the fund at all when the trustees resolve on postponement.”

Lord O'Hagan says,—“In this way the settlor provided that his purposes should be carried into effect, and the result was that the beneficiaries took an estate vested in them, and if the trustees thought proper, to belong to them absolutely at the periods indicated, but it was a qualified estate to be enjoyed by them only on the conditions and at the times which the trustees in their uncontrolled discretion might appoint.”

Lord Blackburn also seems to take the view that the beneficiary took a qualified fee subject to divestiture in the discretion of the trustees; but that neither he nor his creditors had right to demand payment so as to defeat the directions and purposes of the settlor. The present case is somewhat stronger, in this respect, that instead of the right of fee being vested subject to divestiture in the discretion of the trustees, the testatrix has herself restricted her son's interest to a liferent, giving her trustees the power, if they think fit, to restore it to one of fee.

It will be observed that in the case of *Chambers' Trustees*¹ not only was there at the outset in the deed an express direction to pay each child a share of the residue six months after the decease of the testator, but it was declared that the shares should vest at the death of the testator. The result, however, of the decision of the House of Lords was, that what appeared to be an unconditional gift of fee was held effectually modified and controlled by the discretionary powers conferred upon the trustees.

If I held that an unconditional right of fee has vested in W. J. Bell, I should feel bound, in deference to the decision of the Court of seven Judges in Miller's Trustees,¹ to hold that the restrictions are ineffectual. But in that case it was admitted that the fee was fully vested; so also in the cases of *Greenlees' Trustees*² and Wilkie's Trustees.³ In all these cases the restrictions were disregarded as attempts to cut down or derogate from a fully vested right of fee.

Without attempting to reconcile all the decisions which were cited to us, I may say that I think the apparent conflict between the two classes of decisions is due to the different views which may be taken on the terms of any particular settlement as to whether right to the fee of a provision has or has not fully and unconditionally vested in a beneficiary. But I do not understand it to be disputed that if upon a sound construction of a settlement an absolute right has not vested, and the funds still remain in the hands of the trustees, such restrictions imposed by the trustees must receive effect.

Here the original will must be read as modified by the codicil. The codicil having been executed after an interval, I think the presumption against vesting is fully stronger than if the directions contained in it had occurred in the will itself, because they were introduced to meet a change of circumstances and a consequent change of mind on the part of the testatrix. The codicil is undoubtedly repugnant to the original settlement, but as it contains the latest expression of the will of the testatrix it pro tanto supersedes the former.

The appellant's counsel was quick to note, and very properly commented upon, the absence from this settlement of an important element to be found in the deeds in the cases of *Chambers' Trustees*⁴ and White's Trustees.⁵ In both of those cases express directions were given to the trustees as to the disposal of the fee of the shares in question in the event of the trustees deciding not to pay them over to the beneficiaries. In the codicil of 30th August 1880 there is no fresh direction as to disposal of the capital of W. J. Bell's share, and this struck me from the first as creating some difficulty. But the importance of such a direction consists in its affording a complete indication of the truster's intention that vesting shall not take place until payment; and although owing to the absence of such a direction this case is perhaps not so clear as the cases of *Chambers' Trustees*⁴ and White's Trustees.⁵ I think that the intention of the truster is sufficiently expressed to receive legal effect.

Reading the codicil with the will, I think the truster's intention is this—the residue is to be divided into four shares; three of the shares are to be paid to her daughters within twelve months after her death; as regards her son, W. J. Bell, the fourth share is to be retained by the trustees and the interest only to be paid to him weekly, the trustees, however, being empowered, if they think it for his advantage, to pay over to him part or the whole of the capital; and lastly, in the event of W. J. Bell dying before the capital becoming payable, being in his case the time when the trustees choose, if they ever do so, to pay it over, right to it shall pass to his issue, if he have any, or failing issue to his surviving sisters. This I believe to be the proper construction of the two writs read together; and by so reading them I think we shall give effect to the true intention of the truster without doing undue violence to the language used.

Process—Leave to reclaim—Remit to Auditor—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), secs. 27, 28, and 54—Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, sec. 2.—In an action of accounting at the instance of a beneficiary against trustees, the pursuer objected to the amount of the business account of the law-agent of the trustees. The Lord Ordinary remitted the account to the Auditor of the Court of Session to tax, and did not grant leave to reclaim. The defenders having reclaimed, the Court refused the reclaiming note as incompetent.

Quin v. Gardner, June 22, 1888, 15 R. 776, distinguished.

Trust—Trustee—Law-agent of Trustees—Right of law-agent to have his account taxed by local auditor.—In an action of accounting brought by beneficiaries against testamentary trustees, the pursuers objected to the account of the law-agent of the trustees on the ground that it was overcharged. The trust-estate was situated in Glasgow, and the law-agent was a Glasgow solicitor. It appeared that the account had been taxed ex parte at the instance of the law-agent by the Auditor of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, without notice to the pursuer, and the defenders offered to have it re-remitted to him. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) remitted the account to the Auditor of the Court of Session to tax and to report. The defenders reclaimed, and maintained that in any view the account should be remitted to a Glasgow accountant to audit, and not to the Auditor of the Court of Session. The Court refused the reclaiming note.

Trust—Law-agent's business account—Taxation—Scale of charges for attending meetings of trustees when law-agent himself a trustee.—In taxing the business account of a law-agent to a trust, the Auditor restricted his charges as a law-agent for attending meetings of the trustees in respect that the law-agent was himself a trustee. The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) having repelled an objection to the Auditor's report, the trustees reclaimed. The Court refused the reclaiming note.

Fraser's
Trustees.

It was provided by Mrs Fraser's settlement, inter alia, that the trustees should, after implementing sundry other purposes, realise the residue of the truster's estate, and divide the proceeds equally between the pursuer and her sister, Mrs Templeton.

The trustees were authorised to appoint factors or agents from their own number, and "to pay him or them the usual and ordinary remuneration."

It appeared from the statements of the parties in the action that the only matter in dispute was with reference to the business accounts incurred by the trustees to Mr Robertson as their factor and law-agent.

The pursuer averred that "the said accounts are inaccurate in various particulars. In particular, the said James Robertson has stated in his said account of intromissions law business accounts and charges for factorage, amounting to £155, 3s. 2d., which are grossly overcharged. He alleges that these accounts have been audited by the Auditor of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, but they were not previously submitted to the trustees, and no authority was given by them for their being taxed by said official. The pursuer has repeatedly called upon Mr Robertson to submit his said accounts to the Auditor of the Court of Session for taxation, but he has hitherto declined to do so."

The defenders stated,—“The truster was domiciled in Glasgow at the time of her death, and her whole means and estate were locally situated in Glasgow. It was an implied term of the appointment of the said James Robertson as agent for the said trust that his accounts should be subject to the audit of the Auditor of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow.” They also stated that the accounts in question had been audited by the Glasgow Auditor, but that they were willing, and offered, that they should be again remitted to him.

The case having been heard in the Procedure-roll, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 4th December 1896, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in the Procedure-roll on the question between the parties as to the right of the pursuer to have the business accounts of the defender James Robertson, one of the trustees, and law-agent and factor of the trust, taxed, finds that the said accounts have been already taxed by the Auditor of the Faculty of Procurators, Glasgow, but that it is admitted that said taxation took place ex parte, and was obtained by the defender the said James Robertson at his own hands, and that without special authority from or intimation to the other trustees or beneficiaries: Finds that in these circumstances the pursuer is entitled to have the said business accounts taxed of new: Therefore remits the same to Mr James M'Intosh, S.S.C., Auditor of the Court of Session, to tax, and to report quam primum; reserving all questions of expenses."

On 10th December 1896 the defenders reclaimed.

On the case appearing in the Single Bills, the pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued;—The leave of the Lord Ordinary had not been granted, and the reclaiming note was therefore excluded by sec. 54 of the Court of Session Act, 1868. The remit to the Auditor was in no sense an allowance of proof. In the case of Quin,¹ relied on by the defenders, the interlocutor, while in the form of a remit, directed an inquiry which was tantamount to a proof. That was not the intention or scope of the present interlocutor.

Argued for the defenders ;—The reclaiming note having been presented within six days was competent without leave under secs. 27 and 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, and sec. 2 of the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870. The interlocutor reclaimed against was pronounced after a discussion in the Procedure-roll. That was the appropriate stage for deciding whether or not there should be a proof, and the interlocutor in question was in effect within the category of interlocutors "importing an appointment of proof, or a refusal or postponement of the same." The defenders had therefore an unqualified right of appeal. In point of fact the Lord Ordinary had been asked for and had refused leave to reclaim. The case of *Quin v. Gardner*¹ was directly in favour of the defenders' contention, and should be followed.

We consider that the case of Quin does not apply. The reclaiming note is therefore excluded by the 54th section of the Act.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note as incompetent.

Thereafter, the accounts of Mr Robertson having been taxed by the Auditor, the defenders lodged objections to his report.*

On 14th January 1897 the Lord Ordinary repelled the objections and approved of the report, and on 28th January he found that it was admitted as the result of the audit that the sum due to the pursuer was £168, 15s. 4d., decerned against the defenders for payment of that sum, and quoad ultra dismissed the action.†

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The interlocutors of 4th December 1896 and of 14th and 28th January 1897 should be recalled, and the business account of Mr Robertson remitted to an accountant in Glasgow to audit. The account was for work done in Glasgow by a Glasgow solicitor in connection with a trust-estate situated in Glasgow, and it was unreasonable to force the solicitor to have it taxed in Edinburgh. The Court should lay down a general rule that Glasgow business accounts should be remitted to a business man in Glasgow to audit. (2) The law-agent's charges for attending meetings of the trustees were reasonable charges, and in accordance with the practice in Glasgow, and should not have been reduced.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Of the two special points last discussed the second seems to be purely consequential on the determination of the question of so-called principle. The other point rests on the distinction drawn by the auditor between the attendance at a meeting of trustees of a law-agent who is a trustee, and of a law-agent who is not. That must to a certain extent depend on the circumstances of each case, and, in particular, on the subject-matter of the business before the meeting. But the recognition of such a distinction seems to me a very sound view.

I do not wish to give any encouragement to the raising by reclaiming notes of questions of this kind, and I am certainly not going to be drawn into a discussion on the relative merits of Edinburgh and Glasgow auditors. These accounts have been remitted by the Lord Ordinary in his discretion to a competent auditor, and it would be preposterous if we were to recall the two interlocutors in question.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, and I may say that, in my view, if the Lord Ordinary had remitted the accounts to any other skilled person, we would probably not have proposed to interfere with his discretion. But the natural and usual procedure when accounts come to this Court for revision is to remit, as the Lord Ordinary has done, to the Auditor of the Court of Session.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, and I have nothing to add except that the

at the meetings of the trustees on the same scale as if he had as trustee no duty of attendance, and was to be held as attending simply as law-agent of the trust.

"Then as to the reasonableness of the parties respectively in the communications which preceded the actions, the pursuer, it appears, offered to refer the accounts to the Auditor of the Court of Session. Now, I can hardly say that that was an unreasonable proposal. The defender, on the other hand, insisted, in the first place, that he was entitled to stand on the audit (made at his own instance, and not under any reference or agreement) by a gentleman in Glasgow who holds an appointment as auditor from the Glasgow Faculty of Procurators. And, though ultimately he offered a re-taxation, he did so on the condition that the account should be referred for re-taxation by the same gentleman who had taxed it before. That appeared, and still appears, to me to have been an untenable position, and I think also it was a position which was specially unfortunate in view of the circumstances that he was himself a trustee, conjoined as such with the pursuer and her sister, and therefore, I think, bound to have been specially careful to exclude even the suggestion that his accounts were overcharged. . . ."

reasons given by the Lord Ordinary for his judgment appear to me to be perfectly satisfactory. He says that the defender in the first instance maintained that he was entitled to stand on an audit made ex parte at his own instance by a gentleman in Glasgow, and that when that was not accepted he insisted that any new audit should be made by the same gentleman. The Lord Ordinary did not consider that a reasonable proposition, and accordingly, the action being in this Court, he thought it right to refer the account to another auditor, and selected the Auditor of the Court of Session.

I agree that the ex parte audit could not be treated as final, and that with reference to the person by whom the new audit is to be conducted, it is out of the question for us to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note.

Police—Street—Taking down and re-erecting buildings—Height—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 290 and 364.—By section 290 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, every proprietor who intends to lay out any street shall make application to the Dean of Guild for warrant to do so, and shall state in his application, inter alia, what is the maximum height above the level of the street of the buildings intended to be erected.

In 1872 a proprietor obtained a warrant from the Dean of Guild for the lining of a street on an application in which he stated that the maximum height of the intended buildings was 60 feet. Held that the lining did not determine the height of the buildings for all time, and did not make it incompetent for the Dean of Guild in 1896 to authorise the erection in the street of buildings of a greater height than 60 feet.

In October 1896 Robert Davidson Waddell, sausage manufacturer, Glasgow, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court there, in which he stated that he was proprietor of certain subjects on the west side of Napiershall Street, and that he proposed to take down the existing buildings and to erect business premises adjoining his present works according to plans produced. He craved the Court to authorise the proposed buildings.

streets, and to grant warrant to lay out these streets all as delineated on plans produced; that the petitioners stated that three of these streets including the street numbered 4 on the plan—now called Napiershall Street—were intended when formed to be public streets, and that the maximum height of the buildings intended to be erected in the line of these streets was 60 feet, and that the Dean of Guild granted warrant to line the whole of the streets in terms of the petition.

The respondent further stated,—“The plans lodged shew that the petitioner proposes to erect buildings in Napiershall Street of the height of 70 feet, in direct contravention of the lining granted to the said John Henderson and Thomas Kay, and the objector maintains that it is not within the power of the Dean of Guild to grant warrant for the erection of buildings higher than those authorised in the original lining of said streets. The petition should therefore be dismissed, or the plans altered so as to reduce the height of the buildings to 60 feet.”

On 24th December 1896 the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor :—“Having considered closed record, plans, and productions, finds that the petitioner's proposed buildings in Napiershall Street are 70 feet in height, and are intended to form an addition to the works belonging to him situated in North Woodside Road and Mount Street: Finds that Napiershall Street was lined as a public street 60 feet in width: Finds that in the petition presented by the petitioner's authors for the lining of Napiershall Street it was stated that the maximum height of the buildings intended to be erected in the line of the said street was 60 feet: Finds that the Master of Works, founding on sections 290 and 291 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, maintains that it is not within the power of the Dean of Guild to grant warrant for the erection of buildings higher than 60 feet in the line of Napiershall Street: Finds that it is not incompetent for the Dean of Guild to grant warrant for the erection of buildings of the description proposed and of the height proposed by the petitioner: Therefore repels the objections and grants warrant as craved. . . .”*

Section 291.—“If the application to the Dean of Guild relates to an intended public street, and is granted by him . . . the proprietor making such application shall acquiesce in and fulfil any conditions which he may impose with reference to the following matters, viz., with reference to the width of the street relatively to the height of the buildings, or the height of the buildings relatively to the width of the street, so as to secure as far as possible that the maximum height of the front walls of such buildings on each side thereof shall not exceed the space between such front walls, except in the case of public buildings, the height of which shall be in the discretion of the Dean of Guild. . . . And every such condition shall be enforceable and carried into effect by the Master of Works.”

* “NOTE.—It appears clearly from the last portion of sec. 290 † of the † Quoted supra, p. 641, note.

The Master of Works appealed, and argued ;—The question in this case was, Did the proceedings in 1872 affect the rights of parties ? The Dean of Guild had not applied his mind to that question, but had treated the application as if made substantially under sections 290 and 291. Once a lining was granted and a building sanctioned of a stated height, however modest the height might be, that limitation was binding, and became the law of the street. The person who came in the first instance and asked for a certain height made his bargain. Why should he be allowed to break it ? Other persons bought property in the street on the faith of it, and it would be a great hardship to them if the heights of the other buildings were increased at the will of the Dean of Guild.

No. 124.

Waddell v.
Whyte.

The petitioner argued ;—This was not the case of erecting a building for the first time in a street for the construction of which a warrant had just been obtained, but a case of taking down and re-erecting a building in an existing street. Sections 290 and 291 had no application. Even if they had, there was nothing in them to prevent the Dean of Guild sanctioning buildings of a height greater than the width of the street if they were not to be dwelling-houses. It was idle to maintain that the earliest lining fixed the height once for all, and that a proprietor, however low the original building might be relatively to the street, was in no circumstances entitled afterwards to build a higher.

Glasgow Police Act, 1866, that the Legislature considered it contrary to the public interest that the front walls of dwelling-houses should exceed in height the width of the street. But it is equally clear that the Legislature did not consider it contrary to the public interest that the front walls of buildings other than dwelling-houses should exceed in height the width of the street by not more than one-fourth in case of streets above 40 feet wide. Taking the view of the Legislature as expressed in this part of sec. 290, the petitioner's proposed buildings not being dwelling-houses, and not exceeding by one-fourth the width of the street, are not open to objection. But this part of sec. 290 only applies in its terms to streets declared public by the Police Commissioners, not to streets sanctioned as public by the Dean of Guild. There is no reason at all why Napiershall Street should not have been made a public street by the Police Commissioners instead of by the Dean of Guild, and it cannot affect the public interest in the height of the buildings whether it has been made a public street in the one way or the other. But certainly the terms of sec. 291 relating to streets sanctioned as public by the Dean of Guild create considerable difficulty, and Napiershall Street is in this position. The Dean of Guild may impose conditions so as to secure as far as possible that the maximum height of the front walls of 'buildings' shall not exceed the space between the front walls (i.e., the width of the street), except in case of 'public buildings,' the height of which is in the discretion of the Dean of Guild. No definition is given of 'public buildings,' but it can scarcely be made to include every building other than a dwelling-house, to follow the phraseology of sec. 290. But the Dean of Guild is given in sec. 291 a certain discretion as to imposing conditions in regard to the height of buildings relative to the street, and he can hardly be wrong in exercising this discretion to sanction buildings of a height that the Legislature considers in sec. 290 unobjectionable, except in case of dwelling-houses. As the Dean of Guild thinks the lining should be granted, it is not necessary to consider whether the conditions as to height referred to in sec. 291 have been made operative by the proceedings in the lining of the street, or if not, whether they can be made operative in this lining. . . ."

Whyte.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This application to the Dean of Guild is made under the 364th section of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866. That is a provision that application must be made to the Dean of Guild before any building is erected or altered within the burgh.

Now, so far as that section is concerned, there is no prohibition or limitation such as is sought to be enforced by the Master of Works. He makes appeal, however, to another set of sections, viz., 290 and 291, and he says that, as matter of fact, this street was authorised to be constructed under section 290, that in the application to the Dean of Guild for authority to construct the street it was stated to be the intention of the applicant that the houses should be 60 feet of a maximum height, and that warrant to construct the street was granted in terms of the application. The argument founded upon this section is that the warrant of the Dean of Guild imposes a perpetual limitation upon the applicant to this Court restricting him to buildings of 60 feet, and no higher. I must own that that is a somewhat startling conclusion. It would come to this, that however modest might be the height of the houses proposed to be built at the time when the authority for forming the street is obtained, that height is stereotyped to the end of time. The matter stands thus, that suppose in 1872 somebody was minded, on a perhaps somewhat lavish scale of building, to have a street 60 feet wide, with buildings of 20 feet in height, and he frankly stated that that was his intention, the imprimatur of the Dean of Guild warranting the street would impose the limitation that no houses there should ever be higher than 20 feet. That is a very strong proposition.

But when sections 290 and 291 are examined it seems to me that no such conclusion is necessitated by their terms. As I read section 290 its purpose is this :—No one shall make a street within the burgh except with the authority of the Dean of Guild. In order to judge of the sufficiency of the street, in point of width and construction, the Dean has to be told what in the end are the intentions of the proprietor about the street, whether it is to be a private or a public street. If a public street, then he says,—“Let me hear what is the height of your buildings, and I will authorise a street which will be suitable for that purpose.” But it seems to me that when once a street has been authorised to be constructed, with due regard to its capacities for what may be its ultimate destination, it is in nowise necessary for the protection of any interest which has been pointed out to us, that the erection of buildings in that street shall be further limited than by the ordinary rules which are applicable within burghs. The height of houses has been determined, not from a consideration of the width of the street, but from other considerations. But the height of the houses was not fixed on a uniform scale, and depended upon the existing intentions of the proprietors. It did not at all follow that there might not be circumstances in which a street might be found to be suitable for other purposes, in which larger buildings would be required, and to hark back to the original intention of the proprietors, and what was the original provision as to the breadth of the street, could only affect the new question in so far as the breadth of the street was or was not sufficient for the height of the proposed new buildings. I think that the conclusion arrived at by the Dean of Guild in his interlocutor is perfectly right, and that we should dismiss the appeal and affirm his judgment. No. 124.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

Waddell v.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, with every desire to do full justice to those provisions of the Police Acts of Glasgow and other cities that are intended to secure the health and comfort of the people who inhabit the streets ; and no one can doubt that it is very desirable that in laying out a new quarter of a town some general regulations should be made, proportioning the height of the buildings to the width of the streets, and practically the air space in connection with them. But it is a very different proposition to affirm that after this is done all alterations from the original design shall be prohibited. If that had been intended I should have expected to find a specific declaration in the statute to some such effect ; but, on the contrary, we see indications that these restrictions are not intended to be perpetual, one of them being that, in the petition to form the street, the applicant is only directed to state what his intention is with reference to the buildings that are to be placed along the sides of the street. In the present case, if the Dean of Guild Court had been considering a new application to put up this street, apparently it would have been the right of the proprietor, if he elected to put up commercial buildings instead of dwelling-houses, to increase the height of these by one-fourth, for reasons which are obvious enough and really do not enter into the argument. And all that the Dean of Guild has done is to give to the present proprietor, for his sausage factory, that height which he might have had if his building had been erected at the time when the street was originally laid out. It cannot, therefore, be said that the interlocutor contravenes, in any way, the spirit of the Act of Parliament, and I am not convinced that it has, in fact, infringed any of the conditions of the Act which have been brought before us. I should have been sorry to come to a different conclusion in the case, because I think that these provisions, intended for health and amenity, are much more likely to be successful, and to be worked out with the goodwill of those who are affected by them when they are not enforced in a rigid and arbitrary manner, but with what I venture to think is the degree of freedom which the statute allows.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

Insurance—Accident Insurance—Conditions as to notice of accident—Post-mortem Examination—Waiver.—A policy of accident insurance with an insurance company provided that it should be a condition precedent to recovery that notice should be given within fourteen days of the accident, and that in the case of death the representatives should agree to a post- Donnison v.

Notice of the accident was not sent to the company till three days before his death. After the death the company wrote to the widow:—"In accordance with the conditions of our policy, we desire to have a post-mortem examination of the deceased." The company did not inform the widow that they intended to reserve the objection to want of timeous notice. The widow gave her consent to the post-mortem examination, which took place accordingly. In an action on the policy brought by the widow as executrix, held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that the company, by demanding a post-mortem examination, had waived the defence of want of timeous notice.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

IN May 1896 Mrs Elizabeth Duke or Donnison, widow and executrix of Amor Spoor Donnison, manufacturer's agent, Edinburgh, brought an action against the Employers' Accident and Live Stock Insurance Company, Limited, concluding for payment of £1000, as being the sum due to the pursuer under a policy of insurance by which Mr Donnison was insured with the defenders.

By the policy Mr Donnison became entitled to certain sums in the event of his being disabled by an accident, and his representatives to £1000 in the event of his death through accident.

The policy bore, inter alia,—"Provided always that this policy is subject to the conditions endorsed hereon, which are to be taken as part hereof, and are hereby agreed to be conditions precedent to the right of the insured to sue or recover hereunder."

Amongst the said conditions were the following:—

"3. The assured shall not be entitled to make any claim under this policy for any injury from an accident, unless such injury shall be caused by some outward violent and visible means of which proof satisfactory to the directors can be furnished, and that this assurance shall not extend to . . . any injury caused by or arising from . . . natural disease or weakness or exhaustion consequent upon disease, or by any medical or surgical treatment or operation rendered necessary by disease, or to any death arising from disease, although such death may have been accelerated by accident. . . .

"4. In the event of any accident (whether fatal or not) occurring to the assured, it is a condition precedent to any right of the assured or his representatives to make any claim that notice thereof in writing must be delivered to the company at their chief offices in Edinburgh, or their Manchester offices, within fourteen days after the occurrence of the accident, stating the nature and date of the injuries, the place where, and the manner in which they were received. . . .

"5. In case of death the legal representatives of the assured must deliver to the company a certificate from the medical attendant of the assured stating, as fully as possible, the nature, extent, and duration of the injuries, and the cause of death, and shall produce all documents necessary to prove their title as such legal representatives, and shall furnish all such other information and evidence as the directors may require from time to time, or may consider necessary or proper to elucidate the case, and shall agree to a post-mortem examination if required by the company."

The pursuer averred that on 3d February 1896 Mr Donnison sustained an injury to one of his toes in consequence of a heavy travelling case accidentally falling on it; that at first he did not regard the injury as serious, but that ultimately gangrene set in; and that he died on 5th March in consequence of the injury.

The defenders, besides answers on the merits, averred that they did not receive notice of the injury until 2d March, being more than fourteen days after the occurrence of the accident, and they therefore pleaded,—(2) The pursuer is barred from recovering the sum insured under the said policy, in respect she has failed to comply with condition 4 thereof, which is declared a condition precedent to her right to sue or recover thereunder.

No. 125.
Mar. 10, 1897.
Donnison v.
Employers' Accident and Live Stock Insurance Co.,
Limited.

In answer to this defence, the pursuer averred that the defenders had, in opposition to her wishes, enforced their right to a post-mortem examination under condition 5 of the policy, and she therefore pleaded,—(3) The defenders, having by their actings waived any objection on the ground of want of notice, are barred from now founding thereon as excluding the action.

Before further answer a proof on the question of waiver was allowed. The following statement of the result of the evidence is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—

"Mr Donnison received an accident to his foot on 3d February 1896. He did not, however, give any notice to the defenders of the accident or of a claim in consequence thereof until the 2d of March, when he wrote to them intimating a claim. He did not in that letter give the date of the accident. On the 3d of March the defenders sent a printed form containing a number of questions which Mr Donnison was requested to answer. He filled up the answers on the same day and sent the paper back to the defenders. One question was,— 'State day, hour, and place of occurrence'; and the answer was,— 'February 3d, at 6 o'clock, in Dublin.'

"The defenders therefore became aware on the 3d of March that Mr Donnison had not given notice of his claim within fourteen days of the occurrence of the accident. Their interpretation of the policy—which is not contested—is that the failure to give notice within fourteen days entitled them, if they chose to exercise the power, to reject the claim without any further inquiry.

"On the 4th of March Mr Donnison was examined by the medical men of the defenders, and on the 5th of March he died.

"On the 6th of March Mr M'Cankie, the defender's managing director, called for the pursuer—Mr Donnison's widow—and arranged for a post-mortem examination of Mr Donnison's body, which took place the following day.

"The question is whether by insisting upon a post-mortem examination the defenders have barred themselves from founding upon the condition which entitles them to reject a claim if notice is not given within fourteen days of the occurrence of the accident.

"There are some discrepancies in the evidence as to what occurred at the meeting between Mr M'Cankie and Mrs Donnison, but the main features of the interview are plain enough.

"Mr M'Cankie had written a letter to Mrs Donnison, which he says that he took with him, read to her, and left with her. I do not doubt that he read the letter, and whether he left it or not is not material. The letter commenced,— 'In accordance with the conditions of our policy, we desire to have a post-mortem examination of the deceased Mr Donnison,' and then certain hours which would suit the doctors were suggested.

"Mrs Donnison was naturally very much averse to the idea of an examination, but Mr M'Cankie told her that the company were entitled to have an examination, and I think that the evidence shews that he read to her the clause from the policy.

No. 125. “Mrs Donnison then said that she must consult her family, and went into another room for that purpose. Her son-in-law, Mr Morrison, was there, and he asked Mrs Donnison to let him see the policy, which she did. Upon reading over the clause in regard to a post-mortem examination, Mr Morrison told her that if the defenders insisted upon a post-mortem examination he did not see how she could prevent them. Mrs Donnison then went back to Mr M'Cankie and said if she was compelled she must let them do it, or words to that effect.”

Donnison v.
Employers' Accident and Live Stock
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

The pursuer was not told that the defenders, notwithstanding the post-mortem examination, reserved their right to enforce the condition as to notice.

On 19th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustains the third plea in law for the pursuer, and repels the second plea for the defenders: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure . . . Further, grants leave to reclaim.”*

* “OPINION.—(After the narrative of facts given above)—The defenders contend that their insisting upon a post-mortem examination did not bar them from founding upon want of notice. Their argument was to the following effect: The defenders were entitled to consider whether they would found upon want of notice or not, and to enable them to do so it was necessary to ascertain by a post-mortem examination whether the deceased had died of the injury or of disease. The pursuer could only found upon the fact of the examination being insisted upon if she could shew that it prejudicially affected her claim under the policy. It was clear that it in no way affected the claim under the policy.

“Now I have no doubt that Mr M'Cankie was quite justified in asking for a post-mortem examination. The claim in regard to notice was one in favour of the defenders, which they could enforce or not as they liked. I fancy that in practice such a condition is frequently not strictly enforced, and in order that the directors might judge as to the course which it was expedient to follow, I think that it was reasonable that they should know what an examination of the body disclosed.

“But then I think that Mrs Donnison should have been told what the position of matters was. She should have been told that the want of notice entitled the directors, if they chose, to reject the claim, and that notwithstanding the post-mortem examination they might still adopt that course.

“It is quite certain that nothing of that sort was said to the pursuer, and it is equally certain that she believed, and was led to believe, that she had a good claim under the policy unless the examination disclosed an objection to the claim of which the defenders were not then aware.

“I do not think that it is necessary for the pursuer to shew that her claim under the policy has been prejudiced—that is to say, that she has been put in a worse position as regards the claim than she was in before. I think that the principle to be applied is analogous to the principle of rei interventus. It is no slight or unimportant thing for a woman to consent to a post-mortem examination of her husband's body, and if her consent was asked and given upon the footing (as it was in this case) that a claim existed against the company which they were entitled to test by an examination, it seems to me that they are not now entitled to maintain that no claim existed. It would have been different if the defenders had not known of the want of notice at the time. But they were fully aware of it, and their position is that it gave them an absolute right to reject the claim.

“In these circumstances, when without warning the pursuer of the position which they were entitled to take up, and might still take up, they insisted upon a post-mortem examination, which would be of no possible

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—In order to warrant the implication of waiver the acts founded on must be acts capable of no other reasonable explanation.¹ The request for a post-mortem examination here was not such an act. The defenders' position was that they would not take advantage of the objection of want of notice unless the post-mortem examination made it clear that the claim on the policy ought to be resisted, taking advantage, if necessary, of every technicality. In obtaining a post-mortem examination, the defenders were doing no more than taking the means of preserving evidence which would otherwise be lost. The defenders were not bound to elect between standing on the want of notice and demanding a post-mortem examination. It was for the pursuer to fulfil the conditions of the policy by giving timeous notice, and by permitting an examination if required, and the defenders did not by asking for a post-mortem examination lose their right to object to the want of notice. The pursuer's argument seemed to be that by asking for a post-mortem examination without intimating that they reserved their right to object to the want of notice, the defenders must be held to have waived their right to object; but the defenders, if they desired to reserve their right to object on the ground of want of notice, were under no obligation to do so expressly.² The defenders, if they succeeded in having the action thrown out on the ground of want of notice, might be liable in damages on account of having obtained the post-mortem examination, but such a claim to damages—the pursuer's only remedy, if she had any—was a remedy ex delicto, and was not relevant to an action on the contract.

The pursuer was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a peculiar case. I am unable to concur with the argument which has been stated with perfect clearness for the reclaimers. This insurance company imposes two obligations upon persons who take out policies from it. One is, that as a condition precedent to any claim, notice of an accident must be given to the company within fourteen days, and the other is that the representatives of a deceased person making a claim upon the company must agree to a post-mortem examination if required by the company. In this case the company found on the fact that notice was not given within fourteen days. But the company, without, it must be presumed, intending to abandon this defence of no timeous notice, seeing that they now state it, made a demand upon the widow for a post-mortem examination. That was certainly a strong step to take where it was intended to take the defence of no timeous notice. There is a natural repugnance in a widow to the idea of a post-mortem examination being made on her husband's body. The company's demand was assented to and the post-mortem examination was carried out. Then after action was brought the insurance company proceeded to state the defence of no timeous notice.

benefit if they were to stand upon want of notice, I think that they must be held to have waived their right to take that objection, and are now barred from doing so."

Donnison v.
Employers' Accident and Live Stock
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

The only difficulty I have had is in the view that the company might have proceeded on the consideration that, if it were held for any reason that the defence of no timeous notice was bad, it might when that had been determined be too late to have a post-mortem examination. That is the only difficulty which has occurred to me. But I think that the insurance company was bound to make up their mind at once what course they proposed to take as to the defence of no timeous notice—whether to take their stand on it or not. If they were satisfied that they had a good defence to the claim in the plea of no timeous notice, then they should have taken their stand on that defence. If otherwise, they should have abandoned it altogether.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that in making the demand upon the widow for a post-mortem examination, without giving her any notice of their intention to put forward the want of timeous notice as a preliminary defence to her claim, the company must be held to have waived their right to state that defence.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. Whether notice was or was not given within fourteen days in the sense of the policy might be a question. In the circumstances of this particular case, I assume, because nothing has been stated to the contrary, that notice ought to have been given within fourteen days from the time when this article—it is called a travelling case—fell on the insured and hurt his foot, and that when the claim was made the insurers were aware that notice had not been given within fourteen days. They did get notice of the injury before the death took place. When they got notice of the accident, their medical man went to see the insured, but nothing was said at that time about the notice not having been sent within fourteen days. There might have been a satisfactory explanation as to why the notice was not sent sooner if the objection had been stated before the death of the insured. But nothing was said about it at that time. Then came the intimation of the death, and after that the managing director wrote this letter,—“In accordance with the conditions of our policy, we desire to have a post-mortem examination of the deceased Mr Donnison,” and then they suggest two different dates and leave the choice to the widow.

Now, at that time the company knew that they had not received timeous notice of the accident, and that there was no policy still current. The insured was dead, and there could be no policy still current after he was dead. There was no good claim according to their view, because there had not been timeous notice of the accident. In that view they had no right to demand a post-mortem examination if they meant to oppose the claim on the ground of want of timeous notice. But they made a demand for a post-mortem, and I think they must be taken to have done so on the footing of having waived any defence they had on the ground of notice. They were entitled to waive it. That is not doubtful. Is it not reasonable to suppose, as the Lord Ordinary has done, that they waived this defence when they wrote the letter I have read, asking a widow for a post-mortem examination on the recently dead and still unburied body of her husband? I agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship that they must be taken to have done so. No. 125.

There was a suggestion that the proper course for the widow was to have brought an action of damages for the post-mortem examination. Probably she would have got heavier damages than the amount of her present claim. Although there may be such a claim for damages, it does not follow that she is not perfectly entitled to take up the position which she takes in the present action. Mar. 10, 1897.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think that the Lord Ordinary was right.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree. I think the company had no right to insist on a post-mortem examination except on the footing of waiving the defence of want of timeous notice.

Held (affirming the judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the Court had no jurisdiction, exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the matter of undue preferences under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, having been conferred upon the Railway Commissioners by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, section 6, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, sec. 8.

The Court granted decree for the rates sued for on the ground that the defender had unduly delayed to get the amount of the deductions settled by arbitration.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 11th May 1895 the North British Railway Company raised an action against the North British Grain Storage and Transit Company, Leith, and Samuel Patmore, the only known partner of that company, for payment of a sum ultimately restricted to £1262, 15s. 9d. as the amount claimed by the pursuers in respect of the carriage of various quantities of grain for the defenders during the period commencing 8th January 1893 and ending 3d February 1894.

It was not disputed that in the accounts as ultimately sued for the rates claimed were within the maximum limit of rates chargeable by the pursuers.

The defenders stated;—(Stat. 3) “In 1892 the Board of Trade, acting under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, issued an order to regulate the maximum rates and charges which the pursuers’ company could charge from and after 1st January 1893, and this order was confirmed and became law under ‘The Railway Rates and Charges, No. 25 (North British Railway, &c.) Order Confirmation Act, 1892’ (55 and 56 Vict. c. lxiii).” By said Act the pursuers are bound to make a deduction from the rates chargeable by them when the waggons are supplied by the trader.”

(Stat. 5) “. . . The rates for carriage are in many cases charged without allowing any, or at all events a sufficient, sum for waggons supplied by the defenders. In many cases where the grain carried for the defenders was carried in waggons provided by the defenders themselves, sufficient allowances are duly given to compensate the defenders in accordance with the general practice of the railway company, and with their obligations under . . . the statute, but in others the pursuers have charged the same rates as they have

* The Railway Rates and Charges, No. 25 (North British Railway, &c.) Order Confirmation Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. lxiii.) confirms the Railway Rates and Charges, No. 25 (North British Railway, &c.) Order, 1892, made by the Board of Trade under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, by which, inter alia, it is provided (section 2) that this Order should come into effect on 1st January 1893, and (section 4) that the maximum rates and charges which the North British Railway Company shall be “entitled to charge and make in respect of merchandise traffic,” “shall be the rates and charges specified in the schedule to this Order annexed, and shall be subject to the classifications, regulations, and provisions set forth in the said schedule.” The schedule to the order, “I. Maximum Rates and Charges,” section 2, provides as follows:—“The maximum rate for conveyance is the maximum rate which the company may charge for the conveyance of merchandise by merchandise train, and includes the provision of locomotive power and trucks by the company, and every other expense incidental to such conveyance not otherwise herein provided for. Provided that where for the conveyance of any merchandise the company do not provide trucks, the rate authorised for conveyance shall be reduced by a sum which shall, in case of difference between the company and the person liable to pay the charge, be determined by an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade.”

charged to the defenders and other traders, e.g., the Distillery Company, Limited, when the grain was carried in railway company's waggons. In yet other cases, when grain was carried in the defenders' waggons, the pursuers have failed to make deductions from the rates chargeable when the traffic was carried in the railway company's waggons sufficient to compensate the defenders for providing the grain waggons in question. Moreover, the deductions so allowed to the defenders are smaller than were allowed to other traders. The pursuers have before and since 1890 regularly granted to traders, who supply waggons for grain traffic in similar circumstances, allowances higher than those they are willing to allow to the defenders, e.g. [various companies were here mentioned]. Further, the pursuers have made to traders supplying waggons for the carriage of other kinds of traffic allowances much higher relatively to the expenditure incurred by these traders on the waggons supplied by them than they have made to the defenders, e.g. [various companies were here mentioned]."

North British
Railway Co. v.
North British
Grain Storage

Co.

In statement 7 the defenders set forth in detail the various deductions they claimed in respect of their having used their own waggons.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) It being the universal practice of the pursuers in dealing with traders to grant allowances or abatements from the rates for carriage in the railway company's waggons to traders providing their own waggons, sufficient to compensate such traders for so doing, and the defenders having on the request of the pursuers and in reliance on their said universal practice provided their own waggons, the pursuers are bound to make such allowances from the rates charged for the carriage of grain therein as will compensate the defenders for so doing. (4) Separatim, the pursuers are bound to make such allowances in terms of the Statute of 1892, 55 and 56 Vict. cap. lxxiii. (5) The allowances claimed by the defenders being moderate, and such as barely suffice to compensate them for the cost of providing and maintaining the waggons in question, the defenders are entitled to deduct the amount of the same from the sum sued for. (6) The balance of the sum sued for having been already paid, or compensated by excess payments made by defenders to the pursuers on accounts prior as well as subsequent to the accounts sued for, and the defenders having raised an action against the present pursuers for recovery of said excess payments, the present action should, at all events as regards said balance, be conjoined with said action, or otherwise be sisted to await the issue thereof. (7) The defenders being entitled under the Statute of 1854 to allowances at the same proportional rates as these granted by the pursuers to other traders, and the pursuers having refused to grant the same to the defenders, the defenders are entitled to deduct the amount thereof from the sum sued for.

The sixth plea referred to an action which the defenders the Grain Company had raised against the Railway Company in October 1895 for recovery of excess payments alleged to have been made by them to the railway company on accounts previous to as well as subsequent to the accounts sued for, for which payments they claimed deduction in the action raised by the railway company.

The pursuers, the Railway Company, pleaded;—(2) The rates charged by the pursuers being such as they are legally entitled to charge, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved. (3) The defenders' statements are irrelevant and not sufficiently specific. (6) The defences, so far as based on alleged insufficient waggon allowances,

* The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 31), enacts, section 2,—“ . . . No such company (viz., railway company, canal company, or railway and canal company) shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favour of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever. . . .”

Section 3.—“It shall be lawful for any company or person complaining against any such companies or company of anything done or of any omission made in violation or contravention of this Act to apply in a summary way by motion or summons . . . in Scotland to the Court of Session in Scotland . . . or to any Judge of . . . such Court . . . and

Section 6.—“No proceeding shall be taken for any violation or contravention of the above enactments, except in the manner herein provided; but nothing herein contained shall take away or diminish any rights, remedies, or privileges of any person or company against any railway or canal or railway and canal company under the existing law.”

The Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 48), section 6, enacts as follows:—“Any person complaining of anything done or of any omission made in violation or contravention of section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 . . . may apply to the Commissioners, . . . and for the purpose of enabling the Commissioners to hear and determine the matter of any such complaint, they shall have and may exercise all the jurisdiction conferred by section 3 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, on the several Courts and Judges empowered to hear and determine complaints under that Act; and may make orders of like nature with the writs and orders authorised to be issued and made by the said Courts and Judges; and the said Courts and Judges shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any decision or order of the Commissioners, cease to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on them by that section.”

The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. 25), enacts (section 2) that the new Commission, styled the Railway and Canal Commission, established by the Act “shall be a Court of record.” Section 8.—“There shall be transferred to and vested in the Commissioners all the jurisdiction and powers which at the commencement of this Act were vested in, or capable of being exercised by, the Railway Commissioners, whether under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, or any other Act, or otherwise, and any reference to the Railway Commissioners in the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, or any other Act, or in any document, shall, from and after the commencement of this Act, be construed to refer to the Railway and Canal Commission established by this Act.”

Section 18 (1).—"For the purposes of this Act the Commissioners shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine all matters whether of law or of fact, and shall as respects the attendance and examination of witnesses, the production and inspection of documents, the enforcement of their orders, the entry on and inspection of property, and other matters necessary or proper for the due exercise of their jurisdiction under this Act, or otherwise, for carrying this Act into effect, have all such powers, rights, and privileges as are vested in a superior Court. . . ." This Act came into operation on 1st January 1889.

* "OPINION.— . . . The defenders' case rests upon the Act of 1854, and undoubtedly that Act may apply, even although the journeys may be different. But then Mr Balfour argued that the Act of 1854, while conferring new rights upon the public and imposing new obligations upon railway companies, made it a condition of those rights that they should be enforced in a particular manner, viz., by a particular tribunal, and that that tribunal, while originally consisting of the Courts of law in the different countries (exercising quoad hoc a special jurisdiction), is now a new tribunal constituted by the Act of 1873, viz., the Railway Commissioners. He points out further, that although prior to 1888 there may have been a doubt as to the powers of the new tribunal, that doubt no longer exists since the passing of the Act of 1888—that Act providing for the Railway Commissioners having the means of enforcing both by way of interdict and damages any claim for illegal preference.

"Now, Mr Guthrie answers all this by referring to the case of Evershed, and it is certainly the fact that that case did proceed on a different view. That is to say, the Judges did assume that, even after the Act of 1873, the Courts of law could entertain actions founded on the Act of 1854—actions of damages in respect of illegal preferences granted to other traders. At the same time there seems equally little doubt that in the two more recent cases of Denaby Main Colliery Company v. Manchester, &c., Railway Company, 11 App. Cases, 97, and Phipps v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 2 Q. B. D. 229, 1892, the decision in the case of Evershed, in so far as it can be held to have been a decision under the Act of 1854, has been more than questioned. For the explanation suggested, viz., that it really was a case under the Act of 1845, does not appear to me to be satisfactory. Therefore the case of Evershed cannot be said to be a case which stands uncontroverted, and that being so, I must apply my

The interlocutor further allowed the defenders a proof of an alleged agreement with the railway company, but as it was not proved it need not be referred to further.

On the same day the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in similar terms, mutatis mutandis, in the counter action at the instance of the Grain Company.

On 12th December 1896 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . (3) that the defenders have failed to prove the agreement alleged . . . and further, that they have not proved, and, separately, have not averred, facts and circumstances relevant to infer an agreement between the two companies to the effect alleged: In respect of these findings, and of the findings in the preceding interlocutor of 13th June last, decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1262, 15s. 9d."

Of the same date the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in the counter action, which, after findings in similar terms, mutatis mutandis, to those contained in the interlocutor last quoted, was as follows:—"In respect of these findings and of the findings in the preceding interlocutor of 13th June last, dismisses the action, and decerns; reserving to the pursuers to bring such future action as may be necessary to enforce any determination on the subject of illegal preferences which the pursuers may obtain from the Railway Commissioners."*

The Grain Company reclaimed, and argued;—(1) They had a relevant claim against the Railway Company for illegal preferences given to other traders within the meaning of section 2 of the Railway and Canal Act of 1854. Although an aggrieved trader could ask the Court to apply the remedy of interdict under section 3 of that Act, where a railway company had given undue preferences, that did not prevent the trader, where sued by the railway company for rates, from pleading section 2 in defence, and he also had the "ordinary remedies at law for extortion,"¹ and might bring an action under the Act for recovery of sums not truly due to the railway company in respect of such preferences.² The interpretation placed upon Lord Halsbury's opinion in the *Denaby*¹ case by Justice Cave in Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail- own judgment to the construction of the statute, and I must say that it is to my mind difficult to resist the conclusion expressed by Lord Blackburn and Lord Herschell in the two latter cases, viz., that the Act of 1854 created a special tribunal for cases of illegal preference; and further, that whatever its powers were, these powers were transferred in 1873 to the Railway Commissioners.

"The result appears to be that I must sustain the pursuers' sixth plea in law in so far as the defence is founded on illegal preference. . . ."

* In pronouncing these interlocutors his Lordship gave this opinion:—

"The Grain Company asked that the action at their instance should be sisted to await the result of a proposed application to the Railway Commissioners. I do not think that this is necessary, and I think it will be better and more convenient that, if the Grain Company obtain a favourable judgment from the Railway Commissioners, that judgment should be enforced if necessary by a new and separate action."

*way Company v. Greenwood*¹ was unduly restricted. Moreover, the case was decided by a single Judge. No doubt the powers originally given to this Court by section 3 of the Act of 1854 were transferred by the Acts of 1873 and 1888 to the Railway Commissioners, but if the argument was sound that the Court had jurisdiction originally to give effect to section 2 of the 1854 Act in defence to an extortionate claim by a railway company, then there was nothing in the later Acts to deprive them of that jurisdiction. Section 12 of the 1888 Act did not take away any jurisdiction previously possessed by this Court, nor give any further exclusive jurisdiction to the Commissioners. The reclaimers were therefore entitled to plead the overcharge in respect of undue preference in defence to the railway company's action, and to set off against the railway company's claim the sums paid in excess and sued for in the counter action. In any view, the actions should be sisted to await the result of an application to the Commissioners. (2) As regarded the period after 1st January 1893, the reclaimers were in an even stronger position under section 2 of the Schedule of Maximum Rates (North British Act), under which, where goods were carried, as here, in the trader's waggons, the railway company were not entitled to charge their published rate, but only their published rate less a certain deduction. Now, that deduction had not been ascertained. The parties differed as to its amount, and till that was determined by arbitration no decree for a liquid sum could be obtained by the railway company. As regarded the counter action, so far as relating to the period subsequent to 1st January 1893, the only course open to the reclaimers was to bring an action for recovery of the overcharges with a view to compelling arbitration as to the amount, and to obtaining decree for the proper amount when determined in the arbitration. The actions ought then to be sisted pending the result of the arbitration.²

Argued for the Railway Company;—(1) The reclaimers had neglected to have the amount of the alleged overcharges ascertained in the statutory manner. The amount was thus illiquid, and could not be set off against the authorised rates sued for. (2) The reclaimers had no case under the Act of 1854. Alleged overcharges in respect of undue preferences under section 2 of that Act could not be pleaded in defence to an action for recovery of charges for the carriage of goods, or recovered by counter claim or counter action if already paid under protest.³ The Railway Commissioners had exclusive jurisdiction given to them to deal with questions under the Act of 1854, by section 6 of the Act of 1873, and section 8 of the Railway and Canal Act, 1888.⁴ An action for recovery of overcharges in respect of undue preference, under section 2 of the Act of 1854, was in any view now incompetent, because the Commissioners were empowered by section 18 (1) of the Act of 1888 to enforce a decree for repayment of such overcharges. (3) The fact that the reclaimers

Railway Co. v.
North British
Grain Storage and Transit
Co.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—We have here two actions, one at the instance of the North British Railway Company against the Grain Storage and Transit Company; and the other by the Grain Company against the Railway Company. The action first mentioned is first in date, and the leading action; the second action has for its purpose the enforcing of the alleged rights pleaded in defence to the first action.

The Railway Company (under the restricted conclusions now insisted in) sue for payment of certain rates due to them by the defenders, in respect of the carriage of various quantities of grain between January 1893 and February 1894. The quantities of grain carried are not in dispute, nor are the rates charged for such carriage said to be in excess of the rates which the pursuers were entitled to charge (except as after noticed), and therefore prima facie the pursuers are entitled to decree. But the defenders maintain in answer to the pursuers' claim (1) that they are entitled to have the rates reduced to those at which goods have been carried by the pursuers for other traders, and (2) that the rates sued for are subject to deduction on the ground that the goods were carried in waggons belonging to the defenders themselves. These defences must be considered separately.

1. It is conceded by the defenders that they cannot maintain their claim urged in the first defence, on the ground that the undue preference to other traders was in contravention of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845. Accordingly it can only be maintained on the ground that the alleged undue preference was contrary to the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854. But we cannot give effect to that defence. We can neither inquire into the facts alleged, nor give the defenders the remedy they seek, because under section 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, and section 8 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888, the jurisdiction to deal with such matters is conferred exclusively upon the Railway Commission.

2. The second defence is based (1) upon an alleged agreement, and (2) upon the provisions of the Act of 1892. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the alleged agreement is not proved, and therefore the defenders can only rely upon the statutory provision. It is to the effect that where goods are carried for a trader in his own waggons, the railway company's rate shall be reduced by a sum (in the event of the railway company and the trader differing about it), to be determined by an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade. Now, here the Railway Company and the trader have differed as to the amount of the reduction, but no steps have been taken by the trader to have an arbitrator appointed to settle the difference and fix the amount of the reduction. Until that is done, the amount of the reduction cannot be ascertained, and consequently the amount of the reduction to which the defenders are entitled is not known. It is difficult to give effect to a reduction the amount of which is at present indefinite. It must be put in figures before we can allow it as a reduction from, or set-off against, the pursuers' money claim.

The defenders ask, however, that their action may be sisted (not dismissed) until the amount of the reduction is ascertained. The Lord Ordinary thinks it better and more convenient to dismiss the counter action at once. I am not prepared to differ from him. The defenders should have proceeded long ago to have their claim determined in the manner pointed out by the statute, and they cannot complain if their neglect of their own rights occasions them the expense of a new summons. I would have been more inclined to listen to the defenders' request had any diligence proceeded on the action now depending which it was desirable to maintain. But there is nothing of the kind here.

On the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and am for adhering to the interlocutors reclaimed against in both actions.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

Poor—Settlement—Residential Settlement—"Common Begging"—Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 76.—In a question as to whether a female pauper had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of B., or was chargeable to R., her birth parish, B. admitted that the pauper had resided in the parish for the statutory period, but maintained that she had not thereby acquired a settlement, in respect that during the period she had had recourse to "common begging," within the meaning of sec. 76 of the Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845. A proof established the following facts:—The pauper was weak-minded, and would not work for her own support, and was, after the lapse of the statutory period, certified insane and confined as a pauper lunatic. During the statutory period she for three-fourths of the year lived with, and was supported by, her brother-in-law and sister, but during the summer months she was in the habit of absenting herself for periods varying from a week to six weeks, and on one occasion extending to three months. During these absences her brother-in-law and sister contributed nothing to her support, and she supported herself by begging on the public high roads, and at houses for help, and receiving coppers, clothes, and food. Her brother-in-law deposed that while he had supported her and allowed her to live in his house he had not been anxious to do so. R. maintained that as the pauper had had a house to which she could always go she was under no necessity to beg, and therefore that her begging was not "common begging" in the sense of the Act.

Held that the pauper had not acquired a residential settlement in B., in respect that, during the statutory period, she had had recourse to common begging.

In July 1896 the Parish Council of Blantyre brought an action in 2^d DIVISION. the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Parish Council of Rutherglen, praying for decree for £11, 10s. 8d. as the amount of advances made, and for relief of all advances that might be made, on account of a pauper named Marion Hunter, who was being maintained at the cost of the pursuers in the lunatic ward of the Hamilton Combination Poorhouse.

Lanarkshire.

No. 127. Rutherglen, which was the pauper's parish of birth, maintained that Blantyre was liable in respect that the pauper had acquired a residential settlement in Blantyre by residence in that parish from May 1886 till March 1892.

Parish Council
of Blantyre v.
Parish Council
of Rutherglen.

Blantyre admitted that the pauper had resided in the parish for the statutory period, but disputed liability on the ground that during that period the pauper had had "recourse to common begging," within the meaning of section 76 of the Poor-Law (Scotland) Act, 1845.*

A proof was allowed. The following findings in fact from the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute were admitted by the parties at the hearing on the appeal correctly to express the result of the evidence:—"Finds (1) that Marion Hunter, now aged 50, was born in the parish of Rutherglen: Finds (2) that she has always been to a considerable extent weak-minded, but for a time in her youth was employed somewhat irregularly in a bleach-work near Rutherglen, as long as her sister, who was then unmarried, could in a manner 'herd' her to her work and look after her: Finds (3) that after the marriage of her sister to a miner, the witness Jamieson, the pauper became more irregular, and thus became unable to support herself by work, and applied to and received relief from Blantyre, where she was then residing with the Jamiesons, but Rutherglen admitted liability, and repaid the advances till 1885, when Rutherglen instructed Blantyre to offer the poorhouse, which was offered and refused: Finds (4) that in 1885, being with child, she again applied for relief, and was sent at the expense of Rutherglen to Paisley Poorhouse, where she gave birth to a child, which soon thereafter died: Finds (5) that from the time when she left Paisley Poorhouse in May 1886 till March 1892, no further application for relief was made on her behalf: Finds (6) that during this period she remained living in family for the most with the Jamiesons at various houses in Blantyre Parish, being constantly there with them in winter, but during the summer she occasionally absented herself for periods, of which the longest was three months, and the rest between six weeks and one week, being in Blantyre, however, the greater part even of the summers: Finds (7) that during this period the only work she did was to attend in a half-hearted way to children of the Jamiesons, and her absences were not due to industrial engagements elsewhere: Finds (8) that whether in Blantyre, in East Kilbride, or in other places to which she strayed in the summer months, she was in the habit of going about with a bag, asking for help for a 'puir body' (that is herself), so that she was generally known as 'Puir Body,' and receiving sometimes coppers, sometimes food, sometimes clothes: † Finds (9) that in so far as she did not support herself by begging in this manner she was supported

On 7th December 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact above given):—
 "Finds on the whole case and in law that while, so far as mere residence is concerned, Marion Hunter's residence in Blantyre during these years might have been sufficient for the acquisition of a settlement, her residence is made ineffectual for that purpose by the fact that she had recourse, more or less throughout the whole of that period, to common begging; therefore finds the defenders, the Parish Council of Rutherglen, liable to the pursuers, the Parish Council of Blantyre,

* Jamieson, adduced as a witness by the pursuers, deposed,—“Marion Hunter . . . has been coming to my house more or less for the last twenty years. As far as I could see, during all that time she has been weak in the intellect. There is no change in her now from then. . . . I urged the inspector of Rutherglen before I came to Blantyre to put her in a place of restraint, and he refused. I was angry with her for running away from Paisley, and also angry with her for running away from my own house when I was keeping her. . . . I then said I would not take her in either. That was eighteen years ago. Notwithstanding that, I took her into my house. When she was beat herself, she came to me. Her inclination, since the Rutherglen Parochial Board stopped her aliment eleven or twelve years ago, was to be on tramp. . . . She was in Paisley [in 1886] for about three months. No arrangements for relief having been come to, I refused to keep her. I have enough to do with myself. Afterwards, when she stayed in my house, it was simply because I did not want to see her on the street. . . . From 1886 she was mostly in the [witness'] house, and only away at short intervals. The longest time she ever was away from me was three months. That was about three and a half years ago. . . . She was away at other periods from six weeks to one week. In the winter time she was with me all the time; but in the summer time she was perhaps three weeks with me and three weeks away. . . . When the weather was favourable she ran away. She only came back when she could not subsist away. She has gone away at eleven and twelve at night, and one in the morning. I don't know how she lived when she was away for these periods. She was not able to earn her livelihood. She must have got it from someone. When she came back to me she brought back stuff which she must have got from people. I have seen her with jacket-bodices and skirts and bread. My boys have told me that they have met her on the road, and got coppers from her. . . . I did not support her when she was away. I cannot imagine any other way that she can have earned her living except by begging. . . . Cross-examined.—She is lazy, and won't work. I don't know if she is perfectly able to work. If she would attend to my house she would not need to be where she is. She did not attend to my house while she was living with me, but she might hold the baby. She is quite fit to attend to the house. She is quite able to work in the bleach-fields so far as her body is concerned, but I don't know about her mind. . . . I was not willing to support her during these years; I had plenty to do with myself. I did support her, but was not willing at all.”

Mar. 11, 1897.
Parish Council
of Blantyre v.
Parish Council
of Rutherglen.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—"Common begging" meant something more restricted than "begging" simply. It was obviously a technical term which required definition. It meant professional begging, and perhaps in strictness ought to be confined to the old system of licensed begging; but as that system was now unknown a wider interpretation would probably be applied. On the most liberal construction however the expression included only the begging of persons who lived continuously and habitually by begging, who had no other resource than begging, and who but for begging would have been a charge upon the rates. It did not include chance alms, nor did it include the voluntary contributions of friends or benevolent persons, or of charitable institutions.¹ Persons therefore who received substantial assistance, after inquiry into the necessities of their particular case, were not common beggars within the meaning of the Act; and the more substantial and formally given the assistance the further removed would the case be from that of common begging. The distinction seemed to be between miscellaneous begging from all and sundry on the public streets and highways, and calling on persons and asking for assistance after endeavouring to shew that the case was a proper object of benevolence. Now, in the present instance, there was not much direct evidence of general begging on the public streets and highways; most of the witnesses who spoke to begging by the pauper were persons who had known her for years, and upon whom she called; but, at the same time, there was some evidence of general begging, and the tenor of the evidence supported the findings in fact of the Sheriff-substitute, which the defenders admitted. The peculiarity of the case lay not so much in the character of the pauper's begging, which may have been miscellaneous enough while it lasted, but in the fact that she did not require to beg at all. The extreme case would be that of a person who had means of his own, but who from eccentricity chose at times to go about the country begging. If such a person lost his money and so came on the rates, it could not seriously be maintained that he had been a common beggar within the meaning of the Act. Here the pauper had no means of her own, indeed, but she had her brother-in-law, who, if not particularly anxious to help her, always did so, as long as she chose to live in his house, which was for about three-fourths of the year during the period in question. Her absences and her begging were due to nothing but the restlessness of a weak mind; if she had remained with her brother-in-law she need not have begged anything from anybody. Such a person could not be described as a common—that was to say a professional—beggar.

The pursuers were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I see no ground for differing from the Sheriff-substitute. As Mr Salvesen has said, the evidence is all on one side. It is to the effect that, during the period in question, for weeks and sometimes even months, this woman was living by what is nothing else than begging. No. 127.

 It is said that a definition of the term "common begging" in the Poor-Law Act, 1845, section 76, is required. All I am inclined to say is that it is proved in this case that this woman was living by common begging. If that be so, then she comes within the exception provided for by the section to which I have referred, and consequently she could not acquire a settlement in the parish of Blantyre, although she resided there for the requisite period under the statute.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. It is proved that the pauper had recourse to common begging during the period of residence which is relied on as giving her a residential settlement. But the statute is quite explicit, that the residence necessary for the acquisition of a settlement must be residence for a period without recourse to common begging. I think, therefore, no residential settlement was acquired.

We are asked to define "common begging." But the language is not technical. It is plain English, about the meaning of which I cannot suppose there is room for any doubt.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I think this woman was a common beggar in the plainest sense of the term.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Volenti non fit injuria.—A bottler, when in the employment of a firm of aerated water manufacturers, received an injury to one of his fingers in consequence of the bursting of a bottle which he was engaged in filling. He brought an action of damages against the manufacturers, in which he averred that "in all aerated water manufactories the bursting of bottles is of constant occurrence, and it is the usual and proper precaution of the trade to supply the bottlers and other workers with rubber or worsted gloves and masks"; that it was the duty of the defenders to supply such gloves and masks; that they neglected this duty, and that in consequence of that neglect the pursuer received the injuries complained of. The pursuer further averred that the accident took place on the day after that on which he entered the defenders' employment, and that he had asked for gloves and a mask, and that his request had been refused by the defenders.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

IN December 1896 James Smith, bottler, with consent of his father, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against Walter Forbes & Company, aerated water manufacturers, Beaverbank, praying for damages for personal injury, at common law, or alternatively under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a bottler of aerated waters, and has been brought up to that trade. . . . The pursuer is still in minority." (Cond. 2) "On or about the 28th September last the pursuer entered the employment of the defenders as a bottler. The defenders have in their works a steam filler which forces water and gas simultaneously into bottles containing essences. The bottles used are fitted with screw stoppers, and are known as Riley's patent. The stoppers are turned loosely into the bottles after the essences are in. The steam filler is so constructed that when a bottle in the above stage is placed in position to be filled, the stopper is partially unscrewed or removed by the filler, the water and gas forced in, and the stopper replaced as before. When the filled bottle is removed from the machine, the stopper requires to be screwed up tightly by the hand to prevent the gas escaping. It was the pursuer's duty to place bottles in the filler, remove them again, and turn the screw stoppers tight. . . ." (Cond. 3) "On or about the 29th of September (the day after the pursuer began work with the defenders), he was engaged placing bottles in and removing them from the filler as above described. When in the act of tightening up a stopper, one of the bottles burst in his hands, and a piece of glass from the broken bottle struck the forefinger of his right hand, cutting into the middle joint, causing serious injuries. . . ." (Cond. 4) "In all aerated water manufactories the bursting of bottles is of constant occurrence, and it is the usual and proper precaution of the trade to supply the bottlers and other workers with rubber or worsted gloves and masks. This precaution is all the more necessary where, as with the defenders, a steam filler is used. The defenders, though they were well aware of the highly dangerous character of the work pursuer had to do, provided no such safeguard, and in consequence of the want thereof the pursuer has been injured as above condescended on. It was the duty of the defenders to supply masks and gloves, and they have been repeatedly spoken to on the subject, but have disregarded all suggestions. There have been previous accidents in their works from the same cause. . . . Explained that none of defenders' employees wore masks or gloves, and that pursuer asked Mr Connor, one of defenders' firm, for a mask and gloves, but said request was refused or disregarded. It was not only the duty of defenders to have a supply of masks and gloves, but to see that their employees wore same. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded;—(3) The defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, having neglected to see that the pursuer was protected against injury by the usual and proper safeguard of the trade, and the

in damages as concluded for.

The defenders averred that they had provided a sufficient supply of gloves and masks, and further pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action being irrelevant ought to be dismissed, with expenses to defenders. (2) The pursuer, having chosen to work in face of a known danger, and without using proper precautions, and having been injured, as he alleges, in consequence of the absence of said precautions, is not entitled to recover damages from the defenders.

On 16th December 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Maconochie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that a relevant case has been stated by the pursuer; therefore repels the first plea in law for the defenders: Allows both parties a proof of their respective averments on record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation."*

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue in common form.

Upon the motion for adjustment of issue, the defenders objected that an issue ought not to be allowed, on the ground that the action was irrelevant, and argued;—The pursuer, according to his own averments, knew of the danger of working without gloves, and went on working after his request for gloves had been definitely refused. The case therefore was not ruled by *Smith v. Baker*¹ and Wallace,² since

* "NOTE.— . . . At this stage the pursuer's averments must be assumed to be true, and he avers that it is necessary for the safe conduct of a bottling business, and particularly of the defenders' business (in which a steam filler is used), that gloves and masks should be supplied to the workmen. The averments bring home to the defenders themselves the direct responsibility for the omission to supply this necessity, and therefore, as was observed in similar circumstances in the case of Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Co., Limited, June 23, 1892, 19 R. 915, the claim of the pursuer is one at common law, and does not depend on the Employers Liability Act, 1880. The defenders, however, maintain that the maxim volenti non fit injuria applies to the case. I think that the averments I have quoted disclose a case of knowledge of the danger on the part of the pursuer, but the question remains whether, in continuing to work after the defenders had neglected or refused to supply him with gloves, he by doing so accepted the risk in the sense of agreeing to relieve his employers of any injury which might be caused by their fault. The defenders rested their case mainly on the class of cases of which M'Gee v. Eglinton Iron Co., 10 R. 955, may be taken as a type, and but for two subsequent cases I should have felt myself bound, under the earlier authorities, to hold that the circumstances disclosed on record were such as to shew that the pursuer had taken the risk upon himself. It seems to me, however, that the case is ruled by the decision in Smith v. Baker & Sons, L. R. [1891], A. C. 325, and the case of Wallace above cited. These cases, I think, decide that where such averments are made as in this case,—that is to say, where it is admitted that the danger was known to the pursuer, but where there is nothing to lead to the conclusion that the pursuer agreed to relieve his masters from liability for any injury caused through their fault beyond the mere averment that he went on working after he had asked that safeguards against the known danger should be provided, then the law is that the question whether the workman was merely sciens or was also volens when he so continued working is a question of fact which must be decided by the Judge or the jury, as the case may be, on the evidence led in the cause. On these grounds I have allowed parties a proof of their averments."

No. 128. a workman who went on working in face of a known danger after his employer had refused to remedy the danger must be held to have accepted the risk as incident to his employment, if the acceptance of such a risk could be inferred from facts and circumstances at all.¹ The defenders did not admit that they had refused to remedy the danger; on the contrary, their averment was that they had provided an ample supply of gloves, but that question could not arise upon relevancy.

Mar. 11, 1897.
Smith v.
Forbes & Co.

The pursuer maintained that the action was relevant on the grounds stated by the Sheriff-substitute.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer avers that in the bottling of aerated waters the bursting of bottles is a “constant occurrence,” and that “it is the usual and proper precaution of the trade to supply the bottlers and other workers with rubber or worsted gloves and masks,” and that this is the “more necessary” where, as in the defenders’ works, a steam filler is used. He avers that it was the duty of the defenders to provide gloves and masks; that they did not do so; that he asked one of the defenders’ firm to supply him with gloves, and that his request was refused or disregarded. It is averred that the accident happened on the second day of the pursuer’s employment.

It appears to me that the pursuer has sufficiently set forth a danger, and the duty of the master to provide against it by appliances, and I think he must be held entitled to proceed to proof of his averments, unless it can be held that his case, as stated, discloses that he worked in face of a seen danger, and so that the maxim volenti non fit injuria applies. The trend of recent decisions has been rather favourable to allowing cases to go to proof where there is a question whether the master has not provided proper and usual appliances, and a workman, who is remonstrating because they are not supplied, goes on with his work in the meantime. These decisions proceed upon the view that it is a question of fact to be decided on evidence whether the injured party has so acted that the maxim applies to exclude him from recovering damages because of the original failure of the master to provide a usual and proper appliance for the safety of his servants. I concur with the view the Sheriff-substitute has stated in his note as to the cases recently decided, and that following these decisions the pursuer should have his appeal allowed that the case may be tried.

LORD YOUNG.—I am not desirous of saying anything that will prejudice the case before the Court; but I must express here my individual opinion that there is no relevant case. The case depends upon the simple proposition that it is the duty of soda water manufacturers to provide their bottlers with gloves. That is certainly a startling proposition. Where a manufacturer carries on works in such a manner that there is danger of stones falling or rolling from a height upon workers stationed below, and an accident occurs, it may depend on circumstances whether those below went on with their work not willingly exposing themselves to risk but believing that their master had taken steps to ensure their safety. That is the kind of case which has hitherto been presented, and which the Court has sent to a jury. Other cases have been held to be tenable because the master had violated some duty imposed on him by Act of Parliament. But I know of no statute or rule of common law which requires manufacturers of soda water to provide their bottlers with gloves. I cannot, therefore, concur in the view that this case should be sent to trial.

Smith v.
Forbes & Co.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuer in this case is a bottler of aerated waters, and in that capacity was serving the defenders when the accident in question happened. The accident was of a simple enough character—a bottle which the pursuer was filling burst, and one of the pursuer's fingers was severely cut by a piece of the broken bottle. Such accidents are, according to the pursuer's averments, of constant occurrence in aerated water manufactories like the defenders', and to guard against injury or danger therefrom it is "the usual and proper precaution of the trade to supply the bottlers" with gloves and masks. The pursuer says that he applied to the defenders for gloves and a mask, but his request was refused or disregarded. He continued to work without them, with the consequence that he was injured, as I have already stated. In these circumstances the defenders maintain that the pursuer's case is irrelevant, that he, on his own statement, worked in the face of a known danger, and volenti non fit injuria.

If it be true (as must be presumed at the present stage of the case) that it is the usual and proper precaution in works like the defenders' for employers to supply their workmen with a mask and gloves to guard against an event of constant occurrence, which may inflict serious injury, and that the defenders refused or failed to supply such articles, then the defenders are, in my opinion, liable for anything that occurred in consequence of their failure or neglect. In that case they have failed to supply their workmen with the proper appliances for carrying on the work in safety, and have failed in their duty to the workmen. But having so failed or neglected, can they be held liable if the workman, notwithstanding and in the knowledge of the danger, goes on with his work? I think they may; and this appears to me to have been decided by the cases of *Smith v. Baker*¹ and *Wallace*² referred to by the Sheriff-substitute. It is not necessarily to be inferred from the workman going on with his work in knowledge of the danger that he is willing to take upon himself the risk of his proceeding. In the present case the pursuer, at least, indicated that he was not so willing, because he asked to be guarded against the apprehended danger when he asked for the appliances usually provided for that purpose. Lord Kinnear said, in Wallace's case,²—"The question whether a man who knows of his danger has agreed to take the risk upon himself is a question of fact, to be determined with reference to all the circumstances of the case." And the same view is distinctly stated by Lord Watson in Smith v. Baker.¹ I concur in that view, and think there must, in the present case, be inquiry into the circumstances.

LORD MONCREIFF.—We cannot throw out this action unless we are satisfied that upon his own shewing the pursuer agreed to relieve his employers

No. 128. of liability in respect of risk incurred through the employers' fault. I agree with your Lordship in the chair and Lord Trayner that the pursuer's statements do not admit of that construction. There is a distinct statement of the danger of the employment if the work was to be done without masks and gloves, and that it was the employers' duty to supply them. It may be gathered that the pursuer knew of the danger because he was not new to the work, and he says that he asked for a mask and gloves. But without knowing precisely how the facts stand, it cannot be said that in continuing to work without a mask and gloves he agreed to free the defenders from liability. The accident happened only the day after he entered the employment of the defenders.

Having in view the decisions of *Smith v. Baker*¹ and Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Company, Limited,² I do not think that we can satisfactorily dispose of the case without proof.

Church—Parish partly landward partly burghal—Repairs to church—Liability for expense of repairs—Real or valued rent—Custom of parish—Res judicata—Burgh.—By decree pronounced in 1761 in an action of declarator brought by the heritors of Kinghorn against the burgh of Kinghorn, it was found and declared "that the community of the burgh of Kinghorn are entitled to retain possession of that proportion of the area of the kirk of Kinghorn presently possessed by them; and that the heritors of the landward parish are also entitled to retain possession of that proportion of the area of the said kirk presently possessed by them . . . and of consent found, and hereby find, that the community of the burgh of Kinghorn has been in use to pay one half of the repairs of the kirk, manse, and office-houses. Therefore that they are liable in the one-half of the present repairs and also in the half of all the repairs on said kirk, manse, and office-houses in time coming." After this decree the burgh paid one half of the cost of repairs on the church down to 1855. In that year the burgh refused to pay one half of the cost of a new manse, and under a compromise with the heritors were assessed in one-fifth only. In 1856, 1869, and 1878, a similar assessment was levied on the burgh in connection with repairs on the church and manse. In all these instances the entry made on the assessment roll was "without prejudice to the right of parties in future similar cases."

In 1894 a question having arisen as to the rebuilding or repairing of the church, the Sheriff found that the church could be repaired, and directed the necessary work to be done. The work executed on the church was of a very extensive character, the expense amounting to about four-fifths of the estimated cost of building a new church.

In a question as to the mode of assessment for the expense, held that there had been no dereliction of the rights and liabilities determined by the decree of 1761; that that decree determined the rule of liability for the repairs of the church so long as the then existing fabric continued; that the Sheriff's judgment being final, the work done was to be regarded as repairs only, and not as rebuilding, and that accordingly the assessment fell to be levied to the extent of one half on the burgh of Kinghorn, and to the extent of the other half on the old valued rent heritors, according to their valued rents.

Opinions per Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear that in the absence of the decree of 1761 the assessment would have fallen to be levied on the whole heritors according to their real rents.

In October 1892 the Reverend William Jardine Dobie, minister of the parish of Kinghorn, presented a petition to the Presbytery of Kirkcaldy calling their attention to the state of the parish church, and the Presbytery in December 1892 found that the church was incapable of being repaired, and ordained the church to be taken down and a new one built. The heritors, being dissatisfied with this order, appealed to the Sheriff of Fife, under the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 96). The Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of the burgh of Kinghorn sisted themselves as parties to the appeal along with the heritors, and were throughout the process separately represented by their own agents.

On 28th January 1893 the Sheriff remitted to Mr Sydney Mitchell, architect, Edinburgh, to report, inter alia, whether the church was capable of repair so as to be sufficient and serviceable, and if so, what would be required to effect this result, and what would be the probable cost of such repair.

In March 1894 Mr Sydney Mitchell reported to the Sheriff that the church could be repaired.

On 2d May 1894 the Sheriff found, inter alia, "that the church was capable of being repaired so as to be suitable and sufficient for public worship, and that in accordance with the law as at present existing it should be repaired," and remitted to Mr Sydney Mitchell to see to the carrying out of the work.

The repairs to the church having been completed, it became necessary for the heritors to levy an assessment to meet the expense of the repairs.

A question then arose as to the incidence of the assessment, and the parties interested agreed to lay this special case before the Court.

The parties to the special case were,—First Parties.—The Heritors of the Parish of Kinghorn, as a body, assessable according to old Scots valuation.

Second Parties.—The Heritors of the Parish of Kinghorn assessable upon their real rents according to the Valuation-roll.

Third Parties.—The Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of the Burgh of Kinghorn.

The followings facts appeared from the case in addition to those before narrated:—

The repairs executed were of a very extensive description including many structural alterations and additions, the details of which were given.

The parties were agreed that the cost of carrying out the plans of Mr Mitchell would not be less than £2889; that a completely new church could have been erected at a cost of £3500 or thereby; and that the greater portion of the area of the church had been so affected by the repairs and alterations that the sittings would require to be

No. 129. re-divided among parties who held allocated sittings immediately before the work was commenced.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Heritors of
Kinghorn v.
Magistrates of
Kinghorn.

"The whole area of the said church has never been allocated among the heritors according to their respective valued rents. Prior to the year 1859, and from a period at all events antecedent to 1759, the area of the church was occupied by the landward heritors, and by or on behalf of the burgh respectively, in proportions substantially equal.

"In or about the year 1859, certain alterations and repairs having been executed in 1853 and 1854, including a reseating of the church, a petition was presented by the managers of the royal burgh of Kinghorn, as representing the community thereof, against the valued rent heritors of the landward portion of the parish, praying the Sheriff to divide and allocate the sittings in the church, to make due provision for the minister of the parish and the poor thereof, and to divide the remainder of said sittings into two equal parts, one whereof to be set aside for behoof of the community of the burgh of Kinghorn, to be allocated amongst the members thereof by said managers, and the other to be divided and allocated by the Sheriff amongst the landward heritors in proportion to their valued rents." An extract of the Sheriff-substitute's decree was produced and referred to as part of the case. It shewed that the following statement was made in the petition:—"That the expenses of executing said alterations and repairs were according to use and wont paid as follows, viz., one-half by the petitioners, the said managers of the burgh of Kinghorn, as representing the community thereof, out of the common funds of the burgh, and one-half by the landward heritors of the said parish, appearing on the valued rental books of the county of Fife, in proportion to their valued rents." The Sheriff-substitute made the allocation prayed for.

"The parish of Kinghorn is partly landward and partly burghal, including, as it does, the royal burgh of Kinghorn. The houses, &c., in the town of Kinghorn have in recent years extended beyond the ancient royalty to such an extent that the real rental of the town outside the ancient royalty now exceeds the rental within the ancient royalty, and the district at the eastern end of the parish, known as Bridgetown of Invertiel, is a populous place, and now forms part of the parliamentary burgh of Kirkcaldy.

"The real rental and population of the parish is as follows:—Ancient royalty of Kinghorn—rental, £3075, 18s. 6d—population, 1400; Parliamentary burgh—beyond the ancient royalty, £4278, 19s. 7d.—population, 600; Landward, £10,470, 11s. 2d.—population, 754; Bridgetown, £2612, 4s. 6d—population, 1000. Total rental, £20,437, 13s. 9d.—population, 3754."

The valued rent heritors as taken from the Cess-roll were fifteen in number. The cumulo valued rent was Scots £12,742, 13s. 4d.

"The parish church of Kinghorn is a very old one, and the inhabitants of the burgh had, prior to 1759, been in use to occupy a considerable part of the area of the church, and the Magistrates and Town-council of the burgh paid one-half of the expense of repairing the church and manse. In that year, however, the burgh refused to continue to pay one-half of some repairs then ordered, and raised an action of suspension of a charge of payment given by the heritors. An action of declarator on the other hand was raised by the heritors against the burgh that the Town-council were only entitled to the area of the parish church that should correspond to the cess paid by them.

"These two actions, after procedure before the Lord Ordinary, were argued to the Court on a reclaiming bill, with the result that decree was pronounced on 6th February 1761. The extract of said decree, inter alia, bears:—'The Lords of Council and Session aforesaid found, decerned, and declared, and hereby find, decern, and declare that the community of the burgh of Kinghorn are intitled to retain possession of that proportion of the area of the kirk of Kinghorn presently possesst by them; and that the heretors of the landward parish are also intitled to retain possession of that proportion of the area of the said kirk presently possesst by them; without prejudice to the heretors of the landward parish Dividing the said proportion of the kirk ascertained to belong to them in common, and to the community of the burgh Dividing the proportion of the said area ascertained to continue with the community; and, of consent, found, and hereby find, that the community of the burgh of Kinghorn has been in use to pay one-half of the repairs of the kirk, manse, and office-houses; Therefore that they are lyable in the one-half of the present repairs, and also in the half of all the repairs on said kirk, manse, and office-houses in time coming.' With reference to said decree, it is explained that the finding of consent therein appears to have been the result of a compromise arrived at after argument had been submitted to the Court.

No. 129.

Heritors of
Kinghorn v.
Magistrates of Kinghorn.

"After this decree the burgh paid till 1854 one-half of whatever repairs were made on the church and manse.

"In the year 1855 a new manse was built, and the heritors proceeded to assess the burgh for the half of the cost thereof as they had before done, but the burgh objected to the assessment, and refused to pay it. At a meeting of parties, held on 19th July 1855, a compromise was come to, and embodied in a minute, from which the following is an excerpt:—'It was then stated that the present meeting had been called in consequence of the managers of the burgh of Kinghorn having declined to pay the one-half of the sum assessed at last meeting for the new manse, upon the ground that, in their opinion, although liable for the one-half of the repairs upon church and manse, they were not liable in the one-half of the expense of new buildings. After considerable discussion it was proposed on the part of the burgh that, instead of one-half, it should be agreed that the burgh be assessed in one-fifth part of the total expense of the manse, site walls, and other expenses connected therewith, which proposal the heritors hereby agree to accept, without prejudice to the legal rights of the parties in future similar cases. . . .'"

The assessment of the new manse was therefore levied four-fifths on the landward heritors, and one-fifth on the burgh.

The Assessment-roll contained the following entry:—"Of which payable by the burgh of Kinghorn, without prejudice to the right of parties in future similar cases, one-fifth—£120. Balance assessable on landward heritors, £480."

Three subsequent assessments were laid on, viz., in 1856, for the balance of the cost of the manse, in 1869 for expenses connected both with the church and manse, and in 1878 for repairs on the church. In all these instances the entry on the Assessment-roll was in terms, mutatis mutandis, identical with that above quoted.

"In the circumstances above set forth, the first and second parties maintain that the assessment for said alterations and repairs falls to be levied to the extent of one half on the burgh of Kinghorn, and to the extent of the other half on the old valued rent heritors, according

No. 129. to their valued rents ; and the third parties maintain that the said assessment falls to be imposed on the individual owners of lands and heritages in the parish of Kinghorn, according to their real rents as shewn in the Valuation-roll ; but, as alternative contentions to the foregoing, in the event of the first question falling to be answered in the negative, the second parties maintain that the said assessment falls to be levied to the whole extent on the valued rent heritors according to their valued rents, and the first parties, also in the same event, adopt the contention above set forth for the third parties."

Kinghorn v.
Kinghorn.

The following were the questions submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—“(1) Whether the said assessment falls to be levied to the extent of one-half on the burgh of Kinghorn, and to the extent of the other half on the old valued rent heritors, according to their valued rents ? or (2) Whether the assessment for said repairs and alterations on said church falls to be imposed on the individual owners of lands and heritages in the parish of Kinghorn, according to their real rents as shewn in the Valuation-roll ? or (3) Whether the said assessment falls to be levied to the whole extent on the valued rent heritors according to the valued rents ?”

Argued for the first parties ;—I. Where there was a custom regulating the proportion in which the heritors were to contribute to the expense of repairing a church, that custom constituted the law of the parish in the matter of assessment. That appeared clearly from the Peterhead case,¹ when read with reference to the *Kinghorn*² and *Crieff*³ cases. The custom of this parish, definitely ascertained by the decree of 1761, and the rule of liability thereby enacted, would remain as long as the church remained the same. It was said that the alterations and additions recently effected amounted to a rebuilding of the church, and that the existing church was therefore a new church. That was not so. However extensive the work might have been, the finding of the Sheriff, whose judgment was final on this point, stamped it with the legal character of repairs. Moreover, to make good its contention that this was now a new church, the burgh would have to shew that what had been done to the fabric necessitated a reallocation of the seats according to the legal rights of the heritors,⁴ but it was not suggested that more than a slight rearrangement of the seats was required. It was said that the rule established by the decree had not been consistently followed, and that the custom had lost all legal effect. But a custom could only be destroyed by acts clear and unambiguous, and frequently repeated, whereas here nothing assented to or done by the heritors could be construed as a dereliction of their rights, for the restriction of the burgh's liability to one-fifth was a matter of compromise, and was “without prejudice.” On the other hand, it was to be noted that the petition to the Sheriff in 1859 was at the instance of the burgh, and that in that petition they in terms approbated the custom which they now sought to reprobate.

II. If it were held that the decree of 1761 was no longer in force, then the assessment fell to be levied on the real rent heritors.¹ It made no difference that they had not had seats allocated to them.² The proviso in section 33 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91),* did not apply, because the whole area of the church had not been allocated among the valued rent heritors.³

Kinghorn v.

The second parties adopted the first branch of the argument for the first parties, and argued further;—II. This was a case of repairing, and not of rebuilding, and in a question between the valued rent and real rent heritors, the assessment should be levied on the former.⁴ The second parties had no right to any sittings in the church, and it would therefore be inequitable to mulct them in the cost of repairing it. The Duddingston case⁵ was identical with and ruled the present. The Kinclaven case⁶ was the case of a manse, and involved different considerations. If it were held that the judgment of the Sheriff in 1859 amounted to a reallocation, then the proviso of section 33 of the Valuation Act, 1854,* applied.

Argued for the third parties;—The assessment should be levied on the real rent heritors. The decree of 1761 was of consent, and the parties to it could not bind their successors for all time, or even for the life of the then existing church. It was the result of a compromise, and therefore came to an end when circumstances altered. The parties had so regarded it, and had no hesitation in departing from the rule laid down. That appeared very clearly from the facts stated in the case. Besides, the now existing church was not the same fabric as that in existence in 1761. The old church had practically been removed, and the so-called repairs were really reconstruction. That being so, it did not matter what the Sheriff had called the work if the result of it was a new building. The estimated cost of an entirely new church exceeded by very little the sum which had actually been spent. Even if the church was held to be the old church, there was no precedent for such a custom as was here alleged being allowed to overrule what was otherwise the law. The Duddingston case⁷ was too special to be of any value as an authority. The real rent heritors were not parties to the case, and all that it decided was that, looking to the state of possession of the church, the presbytery were entitled to levy the assessment on the valued rent heritors. The general question was, however, reserved. The true rule was that the whole heritors were liable, according to their real rents for repairs and rebuilding, whether of church or manse.⁸ The principle of the rule was founded on the twofold consideration, that to take the valued rent would be inequitable, while to take real rent was equitable. It

Kinghorn v.
Magistrates of Kinghorn.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion, the decree of 1761 is the rule of liability for the repair of the church in question. That decree determined in express terms two matters which were directly related to one another. On the one hand, it gave to the burgh of Kinghorn one-half of the area of the church, and on the other hand, it imposed on the burgh one-half of the expense of repairing, in all time coming, the church, the area of which had been so divided. So long, then, as this church lasts, this and none other is the law of the matter. The decree necessarily applies solely to that fabric which was the subject of the actions and the area of which was divided. It has and could have no application to a new church, which might be built of a totally different size and might be divided in entirely different proportions.

The facts set out in the case, of certain repairs having been paid in different shares, do not constitute a dereliction of the rights determined by the decree. All was done without prejudice to existing rights.

Again, the proceedings before the Sheriff in 1859 did not disturb the right secured to the burgh of having one half of the area, and have no effect in altering its liabilities.

In this view of the law, the only question remaining is whether the existing church is the same building as that to which the decree of 1761 applied. Now, the presbytery had ordered that a new church be built. According to well settled law, heritors are not bound to build a new church to meet the requirements of an increased population, or for any other reason than that the existing church is incapable of repairs. In this case a heritor appealed against the order of the presbytery; their judgment was recalled by the Sheriff, and he ordered the existing church to be repaired. The work which has been done is certainly very extensive; much of the existing structure has been taken down and replaced, and the expense has been about four-fifths of the estimated cost of a new church. Not the less, however, does it seem to me that what stands is not a new church, but the church to which the decree of 1761 applied.

I am for answering the first query in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM.—It was maintained to us on the facts of this case, that looking to the extent of the repairs and alterations on the fabric of the church, the case should be treated, not as one of repairing an existing church, but of building a new one. As your Lordship has pointed out, the case came before the Sheriff, whose decision on this point is by statute final, and he held that it was a case of repairs upon an old church. Accordingly, whatever opinion we may have formed at the beginning of the argument, as to whether so extensive repairs and alterations on the fabric of the church could be described as being simply “repairs,” we must treat the decision of the Sheriff as final, and we must consider the case on that assumption.

Now, the considerations applying to the two cases are quite different, for with regard to repairing an old church, it is only questions of architecture which have to be considered, while with regard to building a new church the considerations are different, e.g., the extent of the parish and the number of persons requiring to be accommodated. But in view of the Sheriff's decision, there is nothing falling under this second category to be considered in the present case.

Heritors of
Kinghorn v.
Magistrates of
Kinghorn.

I think, in the second place, that the 33d section of the Valuation Act has no application here, for it only applies where the whole area of a church is allocated among the heritors assessed on their valued rental. That is not the case here, for we see from the facts stated that one-half has been allocated to the burgh of Kinghorn and only the other half to the valued heritors, and accordingly the section does not apply.

I confess that, in my opinion, had there been nothing here to prevent the application of the principle of cases such as The Heritors of Kinclaven,¹ we should have thought it right to lay the burden on the real rent heritors, but I agree that we cannot do so in face of the judgment of 1761. That judgment determined, in a competent action raised between competent parties, that the division of the area of the church should be one-half to the burgh of Kinghorn, and one-half to the heritors of the landward parish, leaving it to them to divide their respective parts as might seem right; and it determined further that each should be liable for one-half of assessments for repairs of the church in all time coming. I agree that so long as the then existing church remains we must follow that rule, but in the event of the erection of a new church there may be occasion for rearrangement not only of the area but of the corresponding burden of assessment. I see no reason why that judgment should not constitute res judicata, unless because it was departed from by the parties by subsequent proceedings. I do not think that is so. We see from the statements in the case that the old rule of the judgment of 1761 was adhered to down to 1854, the assessment being in every instance one-half on the burgh and one-half on the valued rent heritors.

But then it is said that in 1855 the rule was departed from—that was in connection with the building of a new manse—and the burgh, it appears, while admitting their liability to pay for one-half of the repairs of church or manse, maintained that they were not liable in one-half of the expense of new buildings. However that might be, the matter was settled by a compromise, “without prejudice to the legal rights of parties.” Nothing, therefore, can be founded on that incident as constituting a departure from the old established rule.

Further assessments were laid on in 1856, 1869, and 1878, but in all these cases also, as appears from the scheme of assessment and the Assessment-rolls, there was a reservation of the rights of parties. These assessments cannot, therefore, be founded on at all as instructing a departure from the old rule.

The only other thing founded on is the application in 1859 to the Sheriff. It appears that certain alterations and repairs were made on the church, including reseating in 1853, and it seems that the landward heritors could not agree as to how these seats should be allocated among themselves, and

No. 129. would obviously be extremely inequitable in the present case if the valued rent was taken. The proviso of section 33 of the Valuation Act, 1854, did not apply, for there had been no allocation.

I think, in the second place, that the 33d section of the Valuation Act has no application here, for it only applies where the whole area of a church is allocated among the heritors assessed on their valued rental. That is not the case here, for we see from the facts stated that one-half has been allocated to the burgh of Kinghorn and only the other half to the valued heritors, and accordingly the section does not apply.

No. 129. accordingly the petition was presented, in which the Sheriff was asked to divide the sittings "into two equal portions, one whereof to be set aside for behoof of the community of the burgh of Kinghorn, to be allocated amongst the members thereof by said managers, and the other to be divided and allocated by his Lordship under this application amongst the said landward heritors of said parish in proportion to their valued rent." It may be questioned what authority the Sheriff had to entertain the application, but however that may be, we find that the Sheriff did exactly what he was asked to do. He set aside one-half of the sittings for the burgh and one-half for the heritors, which he then proceeded to apportion to them. The Sheriff thus gave effect to the old rule of the judgment of 1761.

Heritors of
Kinghorn v.
Magistrates of Kinghorn.

I agree with your Lordship that we cannot alter this rule. I think the judgment of 1761 has never been departed from.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur. I agree with Lord Adam that if the rights and liabilities of the parties in this church had not been determined by a final judgment we should most probably have divided the liability, in accordance with the principles laid down in a series of well-known cases, among all the heritors in proportion to their real rents as appearing in the Valuation-roll. But I think that the law in this parish has been fixed by two judgments. By the decree of 1761 it was decided that so long as the church of Kinghorn then in question existed, its area must be divided between the community of the burgh of Kinghorn on the one hand, and the valued rent landward heritors on the other hand, and that the assessments for the repairs of the church must be divided in the same way. I think, further, that, as a result of the judgment of the Sheriff in 1894, the building now in question must be treated as the same church to which the decree of 1761 related, and not as a new and different church. I accordingly agree with your Lordships that the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative.

having prepared plans commenced to rebuild within the three months, but on 11th January 1897 A reported that the plans had been submitted to him, and that they were not fitted to produce a building of the market value of £15,000, and were in other respects unsatisfactory. No. 130.

The Lord Ordinary thereupon, following the report, found that the defender had not commenced a building of the kind required by the judgment within the three months. The defender having reclaimed, the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, holding that as the defender had commenced to build within three months, he must be left to act upon his own responsibility, and that the function of the reporter was merely to see that the work was being proceeded with, and when that work was completed to report whether it was what was ordered.

Ld. Kyllachy.

In conjoined actions at the instance of William Hunter Marshall against the Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Company, Limited, the Eagle Property Company, Limited, and John Wilson, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), by interlocutor dated 1st March 1895, inter alia, decerned and ordained "the whole defenders, jointly and severally, forthwith to proceed to rebuild the buildings of the hydropathic establishment, which were erected on the subjects contained in the feu-contract referred to in the summons in terms thereof, and which were, on or about 7th November 1893, destroyed by fire, and that to the extent necessary to maintain said buildings as of the total value of £15,000, said rebuilding to be commenced within three months of the date hereof, to be duly proceeded with to the satisfaction of John Dick Peddie, architect, Edinburgh, and to be completed to his satisfaction within two years from the date hereof. Quoad ultra continues the cause."

Sundry procedure followed upon this interlocutor, but the only variation made upon the portion above quoted was to fix the date, within three months of which the building was ordered to be commenced, as at 8th May 1896.

The defenders having commenced the building operations, the plans which they had prepared were sent to Mr Peddie.

On 11th January 1897 Mr Peddie lodged a report, in which he stated,—"In obedience to the above interlocutor the reporter carefully considered to what extent it is necessary to rebuild the buildings of the hydropathic establishment which were destroyed by fire, in order to provide and maintain said buildings as of the total value of £15,000, and after full investigation he came to the conclusion that the rebuilding must be of such extent as to afford bedroom accommodation for 100 visitors, with the necessary public and service departments suitable for that number.

"Since the investigation was made which led to his forming this opinion the reporter has seen the plans of the building which was destroyed, from which it appears that it provided for the reception of practically 100 visitors. Whilst in certain respects the planning and construction of the old building was defective, and it was extravagant in respect of the height of the ground floor rooms, the accommodation provided was of a suitable extent and character, and the reporter is therefore of opinion that the new building must provide similar accommodation, but with such alterations in reference to the matters referred to above as may commend themselves.

"The plans and other documents in connection with the rebuilding which have been submitted to the reporter are not for rebuilding in

No. 130. the sense of providing a building on the lines of that which was destroyed, but are for a building of entirely different design and character.

Mar. 12, 1897.
Marshall v.
Callander and Trossachs
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

"It is possibly open to question whether the terms of the interlocutor would be satisfied were a new building of entirely different design constructed, even assuming it to be well planned, substantially built, and of the required size to be of the market value of £15,000, but the reporter thought it unnecessary to ask for your Lordship's opinion on the point, as the plans submitted fail to meet certain conditions which are alike essential in case of partial restoration of the old building, or the construction of a new one to take its place. The accommodation provided by the plans submitted is deficient, the arrangements are in many respects unsatisfactory, and the methods of construction proposed are not such as are fitted to produce a building which would have a value in the market of £15,000, an essential condition to that end being that the structure shall be of a substantial and durable nature."

He also set out various details which shewed the proposed building to be very different from the original building, and which were in his opinion altogether unsatisfactory.

The following objections were lodged to the report by the Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Company:—"1. The defenders object to Mr Dick Peddie's report in respect that it proceeds upon the assumption that the building to be erected by the defenders must be of the market value of £15,000. The defenders submit that this assumption proceeds upon a misinterpretation of the interlocutor of 1st March 1895, and of the feu-charter. The defenders maintain that they will fulfil their obligation if they judiciously expend a sum of £15,000 upon the erection of a building suitable for a hydropathic establishment. In point of fact, the building which the defenders propose to erect will, as appears from the estimates, cost upwards of £20,000.

"The defenders maintain that the suggested test of market value is so vague and uncertain that it cannot have been contemplated either by the Court or by the parties to the feu-charter, and that it is impossible to apply it practically. There are no means of knowing what sum would be obtained in the market on the sale of a hydropathic establishment.

"2. The defenders further object to the report in so far as it gives effect to the pursuer's contention that he is entitled to insist upon restoration of the original buildings which were destroyed, and that the defenders will not fulfil their obligation if they erect a building suitable for a hydropathic establishment, and of the value of £15,000, but different in character and design from the original building. The reporter while raising this question states that it is unnecessary for him to ask for an opinion from the Lord Ordinary on the point. It appears, however, to the defenders, from the references which the reporter makes to the accommodation of the old hydropathic, and to the plans thereof, that he has substantially given effect to the pursuer's contention on this point.

"The defenders do not admit that the building which they propose to erect is (as stated in the report) entirely different in design and character from the old hydropathic. The new building, though one storey lower than the old one, will be built on the same foundation, and is similar in design and character. Even, however, if the facts were as stated by the reporter, the defenders submit that the pur-suer's contention is unwarranted by the interlocutor and feu-charter, No. 130. and ought to be negatived.

"3. The defenders further object to the report in respect that it proceeds upon an erroneous view of the reporter's position and duties under the interlocutor of 1st March 1896. The defenders are advised that Mr Dick Peddie's duties under that interlocutor are merely ministerial, that he is appointed to see that the defenders lose no time in rebuilding, and that the work is properly executed, but that he is not constituted judge on questions of value, or in regard to the plans and design of the work."

Mar. 12, 1897.
Marshall v.
Callander and Trossachs
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

Answers were lodged by the pursuer to these objections:—"1. The pursuer submits that under the judgment of the Lord Ordinary of 1st March 1895, as affirmed by the Inner-House on 18th July 1895, and by the House of Lords on 8th May 1896, he is entitled to have the buildings of the hydropathic establishment, which were erected in terms of the feu-contract, and which were destroyed by fire in November 1893, rebuilt to the extent necessary to maintain the said buildings as of the total market value of £15,000. Explained also that under the feu-contract the obligation on the vassals is, 'to erect in conformity with the plans and elevations to be approved in writing' by the superior 'a building or buildings suitable for a hydropathic establishment, and of not less value than £15,000 sterling,' and that the vassals are taken 'bound and obliged to uphold buildings of that value in good order and repair in all time coming, and to keep the same constantly insured with a good and established insurance company to the extent of not less than £15,000 against loss by fire, and in case the said buildings are, or any part thereof is, destroyed, to rebuild the same, or the part destroyed, so as to maintain the total value of £15,000.' In these circumstances the pursuer submits that the defenders' objections are not well founded, and that the judicious expenditure of £15,000 would not necessarily be full implement of their obligation under the judgment of the Court and the said feu-contract. The pursuer further submits that there is no difficulty in determining the market value.

"2. The pursuer submits that he is entitled to insist upon the reinstatement of the original buildings which were destroyed by fire to the extent necessary to maintain them as of the value of £15,000, in terms of the feu-contract, and of the judgment of the Court to that effect. He acquiesces, however, in the reporter's view that there may be alterations as regards such matters as the height and size of the rooms.

"3. The pursuer submits that the reporter is acting in accordance with the powers and duties conferred upon him by his appointment under the interlocutor of 1st March 1895, and that the reporter's duty is not limited as alleged by the defenders."

On 3d February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that upon the just construction of the feu-contract, and of the judgment of the Court affirmed by the House of Lords, the defenders are bound to erect in lieu of the building destroyed by fire a building suitable for a hydropathic establishment, which shall be of the value of at least £15,000,—that is to say, shall be capable of realising that value if put into the market along with the ground feued or so much thereof as may be necessary to its most advantageous disposal: Finds that it is sufficiently established by Mr Peddie's report that the building of which plans have been pre-

No. 130. Mar. 12, 1897. Marshall v. Callander and Trossachs Hydropathic Co., Limited. pared, and which has been or is about to be commenced in accordance with those plans, is not a building which satisfies or will satisfy the above conditions: Finds therefore that the defenders have not commenced the erection of the building required by the judgment of the Court within three months from the date of the judgment of the Court, or of the House of Lords: With these findings, appoints the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure, and grants leave to reclaim." *

* "OPINION.—I think the interlocutor which I have read perhaps sufficiently explains itself. But there are one or two points which are touched upon in the objections and answers, as to which I may say a word.

"In the first place, it does not appear to me that Mr Peddie went at all beyond his province in examining the plans of the proposed building, and in reporting upon those plans as he has done. The judgment of the Court directs that the building shall be commenced within a certain time, and 'duly proceeded with' at the sight of him (Mr Peddie); and that being so, I take it that it was not only his right but his duty to ascertain and report whether the building was being proceeded with in due course,—that is to say, in conformity with the judgment of the Court.

"In the next place, although this point was not specially raised at the discussion, I see no reason why in a matter of this kind—a matter of skilled opinion and ultimately of valuation—the Court, if satisfied as to the correctness of the reporter's principles, should not accept and proceed upon the reporter's conclusions. The alternative would of course be a proof with a number of skilled witnesses on either side, a procedure which I should deprecate. In point of fact neither party moved for a proof. If they should do so elsewhere the point will no doubt be considered.

"In the third place, I see no reason why the requirement of the feu-contract, and of the judgment of the Court, to the effect that the building to be erected shall be of a certain 'value,' should not be construed in its natural sense. The stipulation is not an unusual one in feuing transactions, and as at present advised, I see no particular difficulty in working it out. The suggestion that 'value' means cost—that is to say, outlay judiciously expended—is not to my mind intelligible. I do not understand how money can be judiciously expended if what is produced is worthless, or not worth the money expended.

"It is a different suggestion that the primary obligation of the defenders is to rebuild,—that is to say, to restore the building which was burned down, and that therefore it should be declared that the building to be erected shall not only be suitable for a hydropathic establishment, but shall also—so far as compatible with the allowed limit of value—be erected on the lines of the old building. But it being once admitted that the value to be restored need not exceed £15,000, I do not at present see that there is any practical object in making a declarator of that kind. It appears to me that the terms—and certainly the substance—of the Court's judgment will be satisfied if a building is erected which, if it had been the original building, would have satisfied the feuars' obligation.

"As to what follows from the views I have thus expressed, I do not at present see how the conclusion can be escaped that the defenders have failed to commence the building required by the judgment of the Court within the time allowed. I have accordingly thought it proper so to find. Whether that being found involves as a logical consequence that I should repeat my interlocutor of 18th July 1896, which was recalled, I am informed, as premature, I do not think that I am called upon to determine. I have not been moved to repeat that interlocutor, and I therefore do not in the meantime do so. If the case goes further that question may also be considered under the leave to reclaim, which both parties are agreed that I should grant."

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only duty incumbent on the Court in the present stage of the case is to see to the carrying out of the interlocutor of 1st March 1895.

Admittedly the defenders have commenced building, and it is not disputed that the building so commenced is to cost £15,000. What is said by Mr Dick Peddie, the architect, to whom certain duties are assigned in the interlocutor of 1st March 1895, is that, if the plans be executed, the building will not be so adapted for the purposes of a hydropathic establishment as to be of the market value of £15,000. To this the defenders reply that there is no such thing as a market for ready built hydropathic establishments, and that the formula of the reporter is meaningless and misleading. They say that they are under obligation to build a hydropathic establishment of the value of £15,000; that they, admittedly, are going to spend that sum; that they have no intention of throwing away the money; and that they know their own business. With more direct reference to the question immediately before the Court, they question the right or duty of the reporter to criticise their plans, and, on some of his objections, they remark that the things objected to were in the original building, the plans of which were approved by the superior.

Now, it is to be observed that the interlocutor which we have to construe and follow, because it is final, bids the defenders begin the building within a certain time, without reference to Mr Dick Peddie at all. His duties begin after a commencement has been made—he is to see that the work is proceeded with. But a commencement can only be made with plans, and after plans have been decided on. Accordingly, the defenders have got to act on their own responsibility, and what Mr Dick Peddie has got to do is to see that they keep at the work. It will be his duty, once the work is completed, to report whether it is what was ordered, and the most obvious prudence will make the defenders very ready to conform to his suggestions made in progress of the work. But I do not think that it is incumbent on him to raise for judicial decision abstract questions of value which it would be very difficult to decide at all and premature to decide until they necessarily arise.

I think it well to note that the pursuer did not found on the fact that his consent had not been obtained to the new plans, or that they did not involve a reproduction of the original building. There are obvious and good reasons for this course being taken.

I am for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. It is clear that the last finding could not stand if the building is to go on at all; for it would only be appropriate if the alternative claim of damages were to be now resorted to. The views which I have stated as to the duties of the reporter and the defenders respectively sufficiently explain my difference with the rest of the interlocutor, and it does not seem necessary to express by interlocutor our estimate of the duties of Mr Dick Peddie. Recalling the interlocutor, we may continue the cause. Either party will be at liberty to come to the Court, neither is invited to do so.

Trust—Nobile Officium—Petition by trustees on English trust for authority to sell heritage in Scotland.—Trustees under an English trust, having obtained the sanction of the High Court of Justice in England, petitioned the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium to authorise the sale of certain heritable subjects belonging to the trust-estate, which were situated in Scotland. The Court granted the petition.

1st DIVISION. (SEQUEL of case reported supra, Dec. 11, 1896, p. 238.)

This was an application to the nobile officium of the Court by Henry Sydney and another, trustees under the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Allan, for authority to sell certain houses at Penicuik, which formed part of the trust-estate.

The petitioners had previously applied to the Court for authority to sell under the 3d section of the Trusts Act, 1867, but the Court had refused the application on the ground that that Act only applied to Scots trusts, and that the domicile of the trust under which the petitioners acted was English. (Vide supra, p. 238.)

The petitioners stated that since the former application they had applied to the High Court of Justice in England, and they founded upon an order of Mr Justice Stirling, which was to the following effect:—"And the Judge being of opinion that it is expedient, in the interest of the beneficiaries under the said settlement, and further that by the law of England, so far as it controls the said settlement, a sale might be made of the property at Penicuik aforesaid, part of the settled property under the Settled Land Act, 1882, but the said Act does not extend to property in Scotland: It is by consent ordered that the said Henry Sydney and Charles Murray, as such trustees as aforesaid, be empowered to apply to the Court of Session at Edinburgh aforesaid for all necessary relief to enable them to give effect to this direction, and particularly to obtain power and authority to sell the said property; and any of the parties are to be at liberty to apply as to carrying out this order."

LORD M'LAREN.—When the Court was applied to under the former petition, the application was made in terms of the Trusts Act, 1867, and we were all of opinion that the case was not covered by the section of that Act which empowers the Court to authorise the sale of trust-estate. But it was observed, in disposing of that case, that the Court had jurisdiction to authorise the sale of trust-estate, and that before the date of the Trusts Act this jurisdiction was exercised, although sparingly, and only in cases amounting to a legal necessity. As in this case the domicile of the trust was in England, we did not think that this was the proper Court to consider the expediency or necessity of the sale in view of the terms of the trust. The difficulty we felt has now been completely removed, because a Judge of the High Court of Justice in England, having jurisdiction, has considered the matter and has issued an order pronouncing that a sale is expedient in the interests of the trust. It is added that the sale might have been ordered in the exercise of the powers of the English Court under the Settled Land Act, 1882, if the property had been situated in England. The question accordingly which we have now to consider is, whether we can exercise an auxiliary jurisdiction to enable the order of the English Court to be carried out. There are analogies which support the exercise of our jurisdiction in the way proposed. The nearest, perhaps, is the case of applications by foreign trustees or executors for confirmation in Scotland, or for authority to complete a title to estate coming to them by an imperfect conveyance. In such cases the Court never hesitates to grant trustees the necessary authority for maintaining their title to real or personal property, where it is necessary to explicate a foreign trust. It appears to me that, when the authority of the Court is necessary to enable trustees to convert trust-estate into money, the proceeding is of the same kind,—that is to say, a purely administrative proceeding,—and that the petitioner is entitled to our assistance after the Court of the domicile has decided that the sale is competent and expedient in the interests of the trust.

LORD ADAM.—I also think this petition should be granted.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. As I understand, the only purpose of the present application to this Court is to enable English trustees to give a good title to the purchaser, it being established by the order of Mr Justice Stirling that it is competent under the trust to sell heritable property, and also that it is expedient in the interest of the beneficiaries that the property should be sold. I entirely agree with what Lord M'Laren has said, to the effect that it is proper that we should give our assistance in carrying out that order.

Bankruptcy—Foreign—Title to Sue—Title of trustee in foreign bankruptcy—Deed in fraud of creditors' rights—Reduction.—Where a domiciled Scotsman carrying on business in a foreign country is declared bankrupt by the Courts of that country, and the administration of his estates is transferred to an official with the right to sue on behalf of the creditors, the Courts of this country will recognise his title to sue in this country.

A Scotsman who carried on business in France was declared bankrupt by the Courts of that country, and a syndic, who, by the law of France, had the exclusive right to sue on behalf of the creditors, was appointed to administer the bankrupt's estates.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the syndic had a title to sue in the Scots Court for reduction of a deed by which the bankrupt gratuitously discharged his right to moveable estate situated in Scotland.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that a gratuitous discharge of legitim granted by an undischarged bankrupt to his father was, after the death of the father, reducible at the instance of the son's trustee in bankruptcy. Reid v. Morison, March 10, 1893, 20 R. 510, distinguished.

Contract—Discharge—Discharge of legitim.—A bankrupt executed a deed of discharge whereby, on the narrative that he had received various advances of money from his father, and that it was reasonable and proper that "in respect of such advances" he should execute the discharge after written, he exonerated and discharged his father, his heirs and executors, of any legitim which he could claim through the death of his father.

Held that the deed was not to be construed as conditional upon the father's claim for repayment of the advances being discharged, but was a gratuitous discharge of the son's right to legitim.

Writ—Delivery—Registration—Gratuitous Deed.—The granter of a gratuitous deed wrote to the law-agent who had prepared it, requesting him "by way of delivering" the deed to the grantee, to register it in the books of Council and Session.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the registration of the deed was equivalent to delivery.

JAMES MIDDLETON PATON, a native of Scotland, who for a number of years had carried on business at Lille in France, was declared bankrupt by the Tribunal of Commerce at Lille in October 1889, and thereafter Francis Obers was appointed "syndic definitif," i.e., trustee on his estate.

On 25th February 1891, while the French bankruptcy was still proceeding, James M. Paton executed, during his father's life, the following discharge of his right to claim legitim,—“I, James Middleton Paton, residing at The Wild, Broughty-Ferry, second son of John George Paton, merchant, Dundee, Whereas various advances of money have from time to time been made to me or for my behoof by my said father, for my advancement in business and otherwise for my benefit, and that it appears to me to be reasonable and proper that I, in respect of such advances, should execute the discharge hereinafter written: Therefore I have exonerated and discharged, and do hereby exoner, acquit, and simpliciter discharge the said John George Paton, his heirs, executors, and successors, and all others his representatives or the intromitters with his effects, of any bairns' part of gear, legitim, portion-natural, and share of executry which I could claim through the death of my said father in the event of me surviving him, excepting as hereinafter mentioned, and of all execution competent to me for the same, and all that has followed or is competent to follow thereon: But excepting from the operation of this discharge any moneys or effects which may be bequeathed to me by my said father in any testamentary deed executed or to be executed by him: And I oblige myself and my heirs and successors to warrant this discharge at all hands: And I consent to the registration hereof for preservation.”

The deed was registered in the Books of Council and Session on 26th February 1891.

On 9th March 1891 John George Paton, the father of James M. Paton, died, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 19th February 1890, whereby he directed his trustees to divide the whole residue of his estate among his children, but declaring with regard to the share falling to James M. Paton that they should retain it in their hands, and should pay him the revenue as an alimentary provision, and make over the fee to his children on the youngest survivor being twenty-one years of age. No. 132.

In January 1892 Francis Obers, syndic in James M. Paton's bankruptcy, brought an action against the trustees and beneficiaries under the trust-disposition and settlement of his father John George Paton, concluding (1) for reduction of the discharge of legitim executed by James M. Paton; (2) for declarator that the pursuer had the sole right to claim the share of legitim falling to James M. Paton; and (3) for decree ordaining the trustees under the settlement of John George Paton to produce an account of his personal estate. Mar. 17, 1897.
Obers v.
Paton's
Trustees.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) For a number of years prior to 1889 James M. Paton carried on an extensive business as a merchant in Lille, France, trading under the name of J. M. Paton & Company. By judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce, Lille, dated 29th October 1889, the said J. M. Paton and his said firm were declared bankrupt, the date of the stoppage of payment being declared to be 5th August 1889, and the pursuer was subsequently appointed trustee—syndic definitive—by said tribunal. James M. Paton was a domiciled Frenchman at the date of his bankruptcy. (Cond. 2) By French law a declaration of bankruptcy vested in the syndic as at its date the whole rights of the bankrupt, including prospective rights of succession. Such rights opening to the bankrupt during bankruptcy passed to the trustee, and any discharge of such rights executed by the bankrupt was invalid, and did not affect the right of the trustee. (Cond. 5) The discharge had been granted fraudulently with the object of securing to the bankrupt the alimentary provisions made in his favour by his father's settlement, and defeating the rights of his lawful creditors, whose debts were then, and were still, unpaid, and who were represented by the pursuer. The pursuer further averred,—At the date when the discharge was executed James M. Paton owed his father a large sum for advances made to him from time to time. The discharge was conditional on the claim for repayment of these advances being discharged, and this condition had not been purified. The discharge was undelivered at the date of the death of the bankrupt's father.

Defences were lodged by the trustees under John George Paton's settlement. In answer 1 they averred that James M. Paton was a domiciled Scotsman at the date of his bankruptcy. (Ans. 2) "Not known and not admitted. . . ." In answer 5 they admitted that at the date of the discharge James M. Paton owed his father a large sum for advances made to him, but quoad ultra denied the pursuer's averments as above given.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said James M. Paton being a domiciled Frenchman, and his right to legitim out of his father's estate having, by the law of France, vested in the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, the defenders are bound to count and reckon with the pursuer, as concluded for. (2) The said James M. Paton not being entitled by the law of France to discharge his right to legitim, the said discharge is null and void. (4) Esto that the said James M. Paton is a domiciled Scotchman, the said discharge being fraudulent at common law, and to the prejudice of the said James M. Paton's creditors, et separatim, being struck at by the Act 1621, cap. 18, decree of reduction should be pronounced as craved. (6) The said discharge having been conditional, and the condition on which it was

No. 132. granted not having been acceded to by the said John George Paton, et separatim, the said discharge having been undelivered at the date of his death, all the bankrupt's rights to legitim vested in the pursuer as his trustee, and the discharge is accordingly null and void.

Mar. 17, 1897.
Obers v.
Paton's
Trustees.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) In particular, the pursuer's averments as to the domicile of J. M. Paton and the law of France are irrelevant.

Proof was allowed of the averments in articles 1 and 2 of the condescendence and answers thereto, the result of which sufficiently appears from the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 16th February 1894, and relative opinion.

On 16th February 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that James Middleton Paton was at the date of his bankruptcy, and also at the date of the discharge in question, a domiciled Scotchman; (2) that the pursuers in the action at the instance of Francis Obers and others have failed to prove that by the law of France the principal pursuer, Francis Obers, had, at the date of the said discharge, any title to the legitim, or expectation of legitim which was the subject of the discharge; and (3) that the question as to James Middleton Paton's alleged disability to execute the discharge in question to the prejudice of his creditors, falls to be determined according to the law of Scotland and not of France; and with these findings appoints the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure, reserving in the meantime the question of expenses."*

* "OPINION.—(After dealing with the question of domicile)—It is, I think, quite clear upon the testimony of the French counsel that there is in a French bankruptcy no vesting of the trustee or divestiture of the bankrupt with respect to subjects of the nature of expectation or rights of succession. The French law on this point is in effect the same as our own. When the succession falls in, it of course becomes part of the trust-estate, and the trustee takes it if the bankruptcy still subsists, but until it falls in the trustee has no right in it, and has no power to deal with it. This was in the end admitted by the trustee's counsel.

"The validity therefore of the discharge comes to depend not upon any question as to the bankrupt's divestiture, but upon a quite different question, viz., How far was the bankrupt (a French bankrupt but a domiciled Scotchman) disabled by reason of the rules of French law from transacting with his father with respect to his claim of legitim on his father's death? As to that question, the result seems to be this:—

"In the first place, it must be taken as the result of the French evidence, that according to the law of France a bankrupt is disabled from entering into any transaction of the kind, and is so not only because of the general rule of French law which forbids transactions with respect to hopes or rights of succession, but also because of a separate and independent rule of French bankruptcy law which annuls all transactions by a bankrupt which may affect his estate, present or future, to the prejudice of his creditors. I am not quite sure whether, if this last matter had been pressed, the independence of the rule as applied to rights of succession would have been quite so clear, but, as the evidence stands, I accept as I have said the proposition that, applying the French law, the discharge under challenge is invalid.

"But while this is so, I have not been able to see how French law is to be brought into the matter. The domicile of the bankrupt—and what is probably more important—the domicile of his father, having been Scottish, it is plain, and is indeed admitted, that in estimating the validity of the transaction the rules and doctrines of the general law of France cannot

On 20th July 1894 the Lord Ordinary allowed the parties a proof of their averments, except so far as already remitted to probation. This interlocutor was reclaimed against, but the Court adhered. The evidence shewed that the discharge had been prepared by Mr Heron, solicitor, Dundee, on the instructions of James M. Paton. It was executed with the object of excluding his creditors. At the date when it was executed James M. Paton's father was seriously ill of the illness of which he died a fortnight later.

With regard to the delivery of the deed, Mr Heron deponed,—“He [James M. Paton] proposed to leave this deed with me, as agent for his father, and I told him I could not retain the deed or take delivery of it as for his father.

apply. The question is confined to the application of the rules and regulations of the French law of bankruptcy, and that again depends upon a question of international law, viz., How far do or should the Scottish Courts recognise the foreign bankruptcy of a domiciled Scotchman as affecting his personal capacities and the disposal of his estate within Scotland?

“Now, as to this matter, I am of opinion that, according to the doctrines of international law received in Scotland, a foreign bankruptcy is only recognised as constituting a valid conveyance to the trustee, or other officer under the foreign bankruptcy, of the bankrupt's whole moveable estate wherever situated. With respect to that estate the bankrupt is held divested, as from the date of his bankruptcy, as effectually as he would be by a Scotch sequestration, and accordingly there is no room for subsequent diligence in Scotland, and equally of course no room for a subsequent Scotch sequestration. But that is, so far as I can discover, the full length and extent to which the foreign bankruptcy is recognised in Scotland. More particularly, I do not find that our Courts have ever given effect to the rules and regulations of foreign bankruptcy law with respect to the bankrupt's duties or disabilities, or with respect even to such matters as the equalisation of diligence or the cutting down of preferences. Such rules and regulations are only operative intra territorium. As explained by the late Lord President in the case of Goetze, 2 R. 150,—‘It is only as operating as a conveyance of moveable estate that the foreign bankruptcy proceedings receive effect. In Hunter v. Palmer (Feb. 25, 1825, 3 S. 586, N. E. 402) a question of this kind having arisen, an English commission of bankruptcy competing with an arresting creditor, it was maintained that by the English law all diligence was voided by a prior act of bankruptcy, and that as prior acts of bankruptcy had occurred, the arrestments were not effectual. But the Court refused to give effect to this, and preferred the arresting creditors, on the ground that their title had been completed prior to the English commission of bankruptcy.’

“For these reasons I have come to the conclusion, as I have said, that Mr J. M. Paton, being at the date of this discharge a domiciled Scotchman, the French law has no application, and that if the pursuer has a remedy (as to which I of course offer no opinion) that remedy must be found not under the law of France, but under the law of Scotland. . . .”

* The following letter by J. M. Paton to Messrs Heron & Co. was produced:—“Dundee, 25th Feby. 1891.—Gentlemen,—I hereby request you, by way of delivering the discharge by me in favour of Mr John George Paton, my father, which I have to-day executed and left in your hands, to get the same registered forthwith in the Books of Council and Session.—Your obedient servant, J. M. PATON.”

 Obers v.
 Trustees.

Evidence as to the rights of a trustee in bankruptcy, according to French law, was given by Leon Renault, Professor of Law in the University of Paris. The result of that evidence was,—(1) that the pursuer, in virtue of his appointment as syndic on James M. Paton's estate, was entitled, according to the bankruptcy law of France, to raise and prosecute all actions having for their object the setting aside of any deeds executed by the bankrupt to the prejudice of his creditors affecting any estate belonging to him, or that, but for the execution of such deeds, might have fallen to him during the bankruptcy; (2) that in raising such actions he represented the general body of James M. Paton's creditors, and was entitled to avail himself of all grounds of law competent to any of them for setting aside such deeds; and (3) that, while his appointment subsisted, individual creditors had no right to raise and prosecute such actions.

On 16th March 1895 the Lord Ordinary reduced, decerned, and declared in terms of the reductive and declaratory conclusions of the summons, and appointed the defenders to lodge an account of James M. Paton's share of legitim.*

* "OPINION.—In this case the question which I have now to decide may, I think, be stated thus :—An insolvent debtor, having a spes successionis in the shape of a claim to legitim, which is about to open by his father's expected death, makes what is in effect a gratuitous alienation of that spes successionis in favour of relatives. In the course of a few weeks, and while his debts are still unpaid, the claim emerged by his father's death. It then appears that, but for the gratuitous alienation, a considerable fund would have become open to the diligence of the insolvent's creditors. An action is thereupon brought on behalf of the creditors (I shall consider the particular instance presently) to set aside the alienation under the Act of 1621, and at common law. The question is, whether it is a good defence to that action that the subject conveyed was, at the date of the deed, a mere expectancy, and therefore a subject which was not at that date open to the diligence of the insolvent's creditors.

"I may say, at the outset, that it does not appear to me that any of the cases cited at the discussion touch the question which is thus raised. It has been decided, Trappes v. Meredith, 10 Macph. 38, that a spes successionis does not fall under a Scotch sequestration. And I have already in this case held, after inquiry, that in a French sequestration the rule is the same. It has also been decided, Reid v. Morison, 20 R. 510, that a sequestrated bankrupt cannot be compelled to convey a spes successionis to his trustee to the effect of vesting in that trustee all right to the expected succession whether the same may open to the bankrupt before or after his discharge.

"But the present question has nothing to do with the effect of sequestration. There has been no sequestration in this country, and I have already held that the French sequestration, except as a conveyance of the bankrupt's estate at its date, has no effect extra territorium. Moreover, the fund here in question is no longer a mere expectancy. The right to it has now vested, and vested while the debtor is still undischarged. It is therefore a fund which, but for the deed challenged, would have been open to the diligence of the insolvent's creditors. In short, but for the deed challenged, it would simply have been part of the acquisita of the insolvent during the period of his insolvency. Now, I know of no decision which touches the right of an insolvent debtor to deal ab ante with estate which he may acquire during insolvency and before discharge. The cases which have occurred apply, in my opinion, to different facts, and depend on different considerations.

"The question, therefore, must be determined on the general principles of bankruptcy law, and considered in that light, I have not been able to find any answer to the pursuer's demand. The point, it will be observed,

After further procedure, the Lord Ordinary, on 3d December 1896, No. 132. pronounced an interlocutor dealing with objections raised to the account lodged by the defenders.

Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The interlocutor of 16th March 1895 should be recalled. 1. Character of deed sought to be reduced.—The deed of discharge was not a conditional offer requiring acceptance, but was the discharge of a right valid without acceptance, if delivered.

2. Delivery of deed.—The deed had been registered for the express purpose of effecting delivery, and in such a case registration was conclusive.

3. Effect of foreign vesting order.—Where a trader was declared bankrupt in a country in which he was not domiciled, the adjudication in bankruptcy only operated as an assignation of the moveables of the debtor which were situated in the country where it was pronounced,¹ but when the adjudication in bankruptcy was pronounced in the country where the debtor had his domicile of succession, it carried his whole moveable estate, wheresoever situated, on the principle expressed in the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam. These were the principles of international law recognised in Scotland,² and in no Scots decision had they been controverted. In *Stein's case*³ effect was given to the order of the English Court, because the lead-is not whether the insolvent may not deal as he pleases with expected successions in so far as the same may fall in after he is discharged. Nothing done in that way would be to the prejudice of his creditors. Neither is the point this,—whether, being still vested in the administration of his estate, he may not sell an expected succession for a fair price. That also would not (at least presumably) be to the prejudice of his creditors. The question is, whether he can voluntarily, and without consideration, deprive his creditors of funds which ex hypothesi would, but for his interference, have become theirs.

“Now, that is a proposition which appears to me to be contrary to one of the first principles of our bankruptcy law, and, indeed, to the principles of bankruptcy law in all civilised countries. The Act of 1621 is of course here unnecessary. It merely aids the common law by introducing certain presumptions, and these are not here required. It is our common law of bankruptcy which here applies, and, in my opinion, it must be held to be the fundamental doctrine of that law, that all gratuitous deeds made by an insolvent debtor to the prejudice of his creditors are null and void; or (to express it otherwise, and perhaps better) that ‘all donations are revocable at the suit of creditors, if granted by an insolvent debtor, and to their prejudice.’ There is no doubt that this was the rule of the civil law (Digest, 42, 8, 1, 6, sec. 11), from which, according to Professor Bell, our law has borrowed it. It appears also to be the rule both in France and England—(Bell's Com. ii. 171). And it is a rule which, it will be observed, is quite general. It is not confined to gifts of what is at the time the property of the debtor, or of what his creditors can at the time attach by diligence. On the contrary, it applies to every gratuitous alienation by an insolvent debtor of which, when it takes effect, it can be predicated that it is to the prejudice of his creditors. The test is not whether the creditors could have attached the subject, or whether the insolvent could have been compelled ab ante to assign it to his creditors. The test is simply, whether

That decision was recognised in *Goetze*¹ as being an application of the principle mobilia sequuntur personam. In Young v. Buckel,² although the debtor declared bankrupt in England was a domiciled Scotsman, the case was treated not as raising a question of international law, but one of the effect to be given to an Act of the Imperial Parliament, and it was certainly suggested that the judgment might have been different, if the adjudication in bankruptcy had been pronounced in a foreign country.³

4. Title of syndic to sue action of reduction.—Assuming that the French adjudication in bankruptcy was recognised as operating extra territorium, it only did so to the effect of passing property. The title of the syndic was not to be measured by Scots bankruptcy law. He could not claim to be in the same position as the trustee in a Scots sequestration prior to 1856, who was held to have a title to sue for reduction of deeds in fraud of the rights of creditors, provided he represented prior creditors.⁴ It would not avail him to found on the French law by which he represented the whole body of creditors, for the Court would not regard the rules regulating bankruptcy procedure in France. To give him a title he must shew that he had an assignation from creditors who would by Scots law have a right to sue for reduction of the

there has been an alienation, whether the alienation is gratuitous, and whether it is to the creditors' prejudice.

"I am therefore of opinion that the deed here in question is reducible at the instance, perhaps of any creditor, certainly of any prior creditor, of the insolvent. And it only remains to consider whether the trustee under this French bankruptcy has a title to sue on behalf of the body of creditors. On this point I must say I have had some difficulty. There is no doubt that the trustee on the French bankruptcy is a trustee for the whole body of the bankrupt's creditors. He is vested with the whole estate of the bankrupt, including all acquisitions during the bankruptcy as the same fall in. And his duty is to distribute the estate among the whole creditors, wherever resident, who choose to rank. It is certain also that among the creditors who have ranked are various creditors whose debts were prior to the deed now under challenge. On the other hand it may, perhaps, be doubted whether the trustee is in strictness the assignee of the creditors, and vested as such in rights of action competent to the creditors with respect to the bankrupt's estate.

"It does not appear that the French bankruptcy statutes contain any provision corresponding to the provision of section 11 of our Bankruptcy Act of 1856. The question must therefore be determined as if it had arisen with respect to the title of a Scotch trustee prior to the Act of 1856, and if that question were open it might perhaps be doubted how far the position of such a trustee was in this matter distinguishable from the position of a trustee under a voluntary trust for creditors, who, as lately decided (Fleming's Trustees v. McHardy, 19 R. 542), has not a sufficient title to sue such an action as the present. It appears, however, to have been settled, at least in practice, that a trustee under our earlier bankruptcy statutes did have a title to sue such actions—(Bell's Com. ii. 172, 174; Edmond, 15 D. 703). And that being so, I see no reason why the present pursuer should be in a worse position than such trustee. . . ."

deed in dispute. Otherwise, he was in no better a position than a trustee under a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors.¹ It was significant that it was thought necessary to insert in the existing Bankruptcy Acts a special provision conferring upon the trustee in a sequestration the title to sue reductions.² In *Bolden*³ the pursuer's title was not questioned, and being himself a creditor, he had an undoubted title to sue in that capacity, although his title as assignee in the English bankruptcy might have been bad.

5. Discharge of legitim no fraud on creditors.—Legitim was a mere spes successionis during the father's life, and might be defeated by his spending or converting his moveable estate. In this case it was to be presumed that the father would have converted his moveable estate into heritage if he had not thought the discharge effectual. The discharge was to be judged of as at the date of execution, and so judged of it was unchallengeable, as it dealt with a spes successionis—a subject which by Scots law, not being property, did not pass to a trustee in bankruptcy,⁴ and of which the trustee could not demand an assignation.⁵ Further, on the death of his father, the bankrupt had an option to elect either his legal or his conventional rights, and the syndic had no power to compel him to elect to his own detriment.⁶ To hold that a trustee in bankruptcy had this right might operate most unfairly to a bankrupt. In the present case, reduction of the discharge would not restore parties to the position which they occupied when it was granted, and it should not therefore be granted.

Argued for the pursuer;—1. Character of deed sought to be reduced.—The discharge was not a unilateral deed, but was conditional upon the claim for advances made to the bankrupt being discharged. Unless and until it was accepted, therefore, it remained a mere offer, and it was not an offer which the father would necessarily accept, for the consideration offered him, viz., the surrender of legitim, was not a benefit to him, but to his children other than the granter.

2. Delivery of deed.—Assuming the discharge to have been a gratuitous deed, it was never delivered, and so could not receive effect. Registration was not in all cases equivalent to delivery; the question was always quo animo had the deed been recorded.⁷ In this case the evidence shewed that the bankrupt had not intended to put it beyond his power to revoke the discharge.

3. Effect of foreign adjudication in bankruptcy.—According to international law, an adjudication in bankruptcy pronounced by the tribunal of one state was recognised by the tribunals of other friendly states; and if by the law of the country where it was pronounced the adjudication had the effect of vesting the trustee in the whole moveable property of the bankrupt it would be recognised as having that effect

No. 132. in friendly states. These principles of international law were accepted by the law of Scotland.¹ There was neither principle nor authority for the view that an adjudication in bankruptcy would not receive extra-territorial effect, unless pronounced where the bankrupt had his domicile of succession. The Courts of Scotland sequestrated the estates of foreigners trading in Scotland, and they would recognise a like power in the tribunals of friendly states. The case of Artola,² if construed as contended for by the defenders, was at variance with the whole course of Scots decisions, and also with other decisions of the English Courts.³ The maxim mobilia sequuntur personam, as used in relation to this branch of law, meant that the domestic law of the state where the moveables of a bankrupt were situated must not be pleaded against the vesting order. The domicile of the bankrupt could have nothing to do with the question, except to justify the setting up of a concursum, but a domicile of succession was not required for that purpose. All that was necessary was a domicile where the debtor might be sued, and that was the sense in which the term "domicile" was used in the Scots cases referred to, the chapter of international law to which the question truly belonged being that concerning the application of foreign judgments. The result of the decisions, accordingly, was that when there could be a congeries of actions, there a concursum might be set up by a vesting order. An inquiry into the domicile of succession of the bankrupt would be a cumbrous addition to bankruptcy procedure. In the Royal Bank of Scotland v. Scott, Smith, Stein, & Co.,⁴ and in Goetze v. Aders,⁵ the persons declared bankrupt were not domiciled in the country where they were adjudicated bankrupt. The result was, if the pursuer was right in contending that the deed of discharge had never taken effect, that the claim for legitim, as moveables of the bankrupt, vested in the pursuer as trustee.

(4) Title of syndic to sue for reduction of deeds in fraud of creditors' rights.—Assuming that the deed of discharge had taken effect, it followed from the fact that the pursuer was vested in the whole moveable estate of the bankrupt, wheresoever situated, that he had a title to ingather it, and to prosecute all actions necessary for that purpose. It was true that the title of the trustee in a Scots sequestration was statutory, but the foreign trustee could be in no worse a position than a Scots trustee prior to the date of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and such a trustee was entitled to sue for the reduction of deeds in prejudice of creditors' rights if he represented prior creditors.⁶ There could be no question in this case that the trustee represented prior creditors, for the deed sought to be reduced was granted after the bankruptcy was declared, and the trustee according to the French law represented the whole body of the creditors. His title to sue was derived from the individual creditors, who had a right to sue if he did not.¹ The title of an English trustee in bankruptcy to sue a reduction in this Court had been recognised.² The position of a trustee under a voluntary trust-deed differed entirely from that of the syndic in this case, for the former had no title derived from the creditors. *Fleming's*³ case therefore did not apply.

5. Discharge of legitim a fraud on creditors' rights.—The discharge granted by the bankrupt was a deed in fraud of the rights of his creditors, and was challengeable by the French trustees. The evidence established that according to French law a bankrupt was disabled from entering into any such transaction, and the question of his capacity fell to be decided by that law, in respect that, as bankrupt, he was subject to the jurisdiction of the French Court.⁴ If his capacity were to be judged of by Scots law, the deed was equally challengeable. *Trappes*⁵ and *Reid*⁶ were not in point, for all that they decided was that a spes successionis did not vest in the trustee, and that a bankrupt could not be compelled to assign it. But if the succession opened during bankruptcy, it passed to the trustee, and the bankrupt was not entitled to defeat the rights of the creditors by discharging it. The discharge only took effect when the right to legitim vested, and operated simply as a gift of property falling under the sequestration. Such a deed was fraudulent at common law.⁷ There was no necessity for any election, because the right to legitim vested on the death of the father, and had to be given back if a testamentary provision were accepted in lieu of it. But assuming that an election were necessary, the trustee had the right to compel the bankrupt to make it.⁸ The ground of judgment in *Stevenson*⁹ was that a husband's title to his wife's estate was not unqualified, but of a quasi fiduciary character, and that he could not be compelled to commit a breach of his curatorial duty in order to benefit his creditors. In *Lowson*¹⁰ the Court merely followed *Stevenson*⁹ without considering the question of principle, and the husband and wife had both elected prior to the sequestration of the husband. In *M'Dougal*¹¹ the husband's title to sue for the wife's legitim had been sustained, because the wife made no objection to it.

On 29th October 1889 James Middleton Paton had been declared bankrupt by the Tribunal of Commerce of Lille, where he carried on business; his bankruptcy subsisted at the date of the deed, and still subsists.

Mar. 17, 1897.
Obers v.
Trustees.

Two sets of questions were argued under this reclaiming note—First, the respondent maintained that the deed, whether delivered or not, did not take effect, because while in name a discharge, it was in substance an offer of a discharge on conditions which were not accepted. Second, It was maintained by the reclaimers that assuming the deed to be an operative discharge, and to have been delivered, it is not open to reduction—(1) from the right discharged being one in which no creditors have any interest; and (2) because the French syndic has no title to sue a reduction even assuming that a Scotch trustee in sequestration might have done so. I shall consider these questions in the order stated.

1. The deed itself purports to be a discharge by James Middleton Paton in favour of his father, of any bairns' part of gear, legitim, portion-natural, and share of executry, which he could claim through the death of his father, in the event of his surviving his father, excepting any moneys or effects which might be bequeathed to him by his father in any testamentary deed. It proceeds on the narrative that various advances of money had from time to time been made to him or for his behoof by his father, for his advancement in business and otherwise for his benefit, "and that it appears to me to be reasonable and proper that I, in respect of such advances, should execute the discharge hereinafter written." Then follow the operative words—"Therefore I have exonerated, discharged, and hereby exoner and discharge," and so on.

The argument of the respondent turns solely on the terms of the narrative. He says that the narrative makes the discharge conditional on the father discharging his claim for the advances, and that this was never done. I am entirely unable to assent to this view. The deed purports to be an absolute discharge; and the reasons given for its execution were accomplished facts. There is on the face of the deed nothing contractual about it. Now, when the legal effect of the discharge is considered, is there any encouragement to the search for such an element? When a child discharges his father of legitim, the result is the same as if the child had predeceased his father; the legitim fund is neither increased nor diminished, but there is one participant the less. Accordingly, the benefit really goes to the brothers and sisters, although the deed is executed in favour of the father. Accordingly a bankrupt, if it were legitimate to disregard creditors, might as a family matter very well say, I have already got half my share of legitim; no more will come to me, for, if I do not discharge my father, it will all go to my creditors; therefore I may as well let my brothers and sisters have it instead of my creditors. My father may claim in my sequestration for the advances if he likes—that will mean merely so much the less for the French creditors.

This, and nothing else, is what James Middleton Paton truly did.

2. The next question, whether the deed was delivered, is susceptible of an easy answer. The deed was given in for registration, and it was recorded in the Books of Council and Session, and the evidence places beyond doubt with what purpose this was done. Mr Heron, the solicitor who prepared the deed, was not the father's agent, and to his knowledge the father himself was not in a state of health to admit of his taking delivery personally. "I said to him," i.e., James Middleton Paton, "that as his father was in such a state of health he could not take delivery himself, and that the only probable course for making the deed effectual was to put it on record. He thereupon gave me written authority to put it upon record." And the letter accordingly runs thus—"I hereby request you, by way of delivering the discharge in favour of Mr John George Paton, my father, which I have to-day executed and left in your hands, to get the same registered in the Books of Council and Session."

Obers v.
Trustees.

If, as is settled, delivery may be effected by recording in the Books of Council and Session, it is difficult to see how it did not take place in this case.

3. Assuming, then, the deed to have been delivered as a present discharge, the next question may be put in this way—would it be open to reduction at the instance of a trustee representing creditors in a valid sequestration?

Now, the argument in the negative sense is certainly formidable, and is rested on the case of Reid v. Morison,¹ and the class of cases of which it is the most recent. A claim of legitim during the life of the father is a spes successionis; a spes successionis is not carried to creditors by sequestration, and the argument is that therefore they have no interest in it and cannot challenge anything done by the bankrupt which affects it.

After full consideration I have come to be of opinion that this argument is unsound, and that creditors have right to challenge a gratuitous alienation by the bankrupt of a spes successionis. The question so far as appears is new. While, in my opinion, the principles which apply to alienation of assets forming part of the estate transferred to the creditors apply equally to alienations of a spes successionis, yet I am unable to claim any of the authorities cited by the Lord Ordinary as intentionally applying to both classes of rights the general language used. I think the question is to be decided on principle.

Again, one of the arguments advanced in support of the interlocutor is plainly fallacious. We were told that by the death of the bankrupt's father there vested in the bankrupt a right to his share of legitim, and that this action of reduction is merely a step to ingathering what has thus come to be vested in the creditors. This is not an argument, but a mere statement of the conclusion aimed at. The true question is what were the rights of the creditors at the date of the discharge when nothing had vested in the bankrupt, and he had only a spes successionis.

Now, the solution of this question depends on whether it is a logical consequence of a spes successionis not being attachable by diligence, and not being included in the sequestration, that the bankrupt has unlimited power of disposing of it, just as if he were solvent. The one thing does not necessarily follow from the other. It may quite well be that the creditors have no active rights in the spes successionis, and must allow events to bring the succession their way or not to bring it their way. It is another and a very different thing to say that by overt act the bankrupt may of design interfere to intercept and divert a succession from ever by possibility coming to meet his debts. The transfer of his estate by sequestration from himself to his trustee does not in principle absolve the bankrupt from that equitable duty to his creditors which the law has more frequent occasion to recognise in the initial state of insolvency. And while the law will not compel a bankrupt to assign a spes successionis to his creditors, it may well, if this be in accordance with the spirit of the other restrictions on bankrupts, forbid them to do any act in relation to a spes successionis which is, and is intended to be, to the prejudice of creditors. Now, the facts of the present case are very gross, and while they must not bias the determination of what is a general question, yet they illustrate what are the realities of the question. A bankrupt, partly out of spite to his creditors, and partly to benefit himself and his family, gratuitously discharges a right of legitim worth several thousand pounds, when the father is on his deathbed. No one can doubt that the creditors are prejudiced; and no one can deny that the act is fraudulent—that word being one of morals. I am prepared to hold that given an act of a bankrupt having those qualities and effects, it does not matter whether it operates on what is at the time or only on what may possibly come to be a part of the bankrupt's estate.

Obers v.

4. The remaining question in the case is whether the syndic who sues the reduction so represents the creditors (whom I now assume to be prejudiced) as to have a good instance. The evidence as to French law places it beyond doubt that according to that law the syndic has not merely the rights of the bankrupt, but that he represents creditors in the fullest sense.

This being so, the only objection suggested to his title is that this Court ought not to recognise the sequestration by decree of a French Court of the estates of one, who, although trading in France, is for purposes of succession a domiciled Scotchman. The refusal to recognise a sequestration in bankruptcy which is valid by the law of the country in which it has been granted can only be justified on the ground that it is contrary to the principles of Scotch law when dealing with international rights to recognise the sequestration of a foreigner. But the fact is that our own law takes no account of the domicile of succession when asked to sequester the estates of a trader, but on the contrary habitually and deliberately sequesters the estates of foreigners who carry on business in this country. It seems difficult to the degree of impossibility for this Court to decline on principle to recognise if done abroad what it is itself bound to do and does daily at home. I may add that in the cases cited by the reclaimers, the word domicile does not seem to have been used with reference to succession at all, and accordingly furnishes no support to the reclaimers' argument.

I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—I entirely concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, and only desire to add a few words expressing my general view on the chief points of the case.

The first question in the order of the arguments relates to the effect which the Courts of Scotland are entitled and bound to accord to a foreigner in bankruptcy, and the claim instituted by its administrator.

In considering this question it is well to bear in mind that, under the statutory law of bankruptcy which we administer, a foreigner who carries on business in Scotland, and who is unable to pay his debts, is liable to have his estates put under sequestration, and further that the subject of sequestration is the estate of the bankrupt wherever situated. In the case supposed, it would be the duty of a Scottish trustee for creditors to take proceedings in the native country of the bankrupt for the recovery, with a view to distribution, of any bequest or right of succession that might accrue to the bankrupt during the currency of the sequestration. In this state of our municipal law I think we cannot be wrong in recognising the same right in the French syndic which we should claim for the Scottish trustee in the parallel case.

The principle of international comity has been liberally admitted by our Courts in bankruptcy cases, and I apprehend that in sustaining the title of the French syndic we are maintaining the principle on which this Court has acted in past times. It is of course inevitable that there should be differences of opinion or expression on such a question amongst the writers who profess to treat this subject from a purely philosophic point of view, but these differences are perhaps more apparent than real; and when it is said that the Court of the domicile is the proper Court of bankruptcy, I think this must be understood to mean a trading domicile. In principle, I cannot doubt that every trader who is unable to pay his debts is liable to have his estate seized and divided amongst his creditors by judicial authority in the country where he carries on his business, because every state has the right of enforcing the performance of the obligations of those who enjoy the protection of its laws. When this is done, there is an obvious convenience in giving a wide extension to the powers of the trustee or administrator in bankruptcy, so that the bankrupt may not be harassed by the conflicting claims of separate administrations.

The claim of the syndic is to receive and administer the legitim to which Mr Paton was prospectively entitled in his father's lifetime, and which he contends became vested in the bankrupt on the death of his father. This claim is disputed on the ground that a few days before the father's death the son discharged the legitim. The deed of discharge was not actually delivered, but was recorded in the Register of Deeds for preservation. It is settled law that the delivery of a deed into neutral custody with the intention of putting the deed out of the grantor's power and conferring an irrevocable right on the grantee, is equivalent to the delivery of the deed to the grantee himself. The recording of a deed in a public register satisfies the required conditions, and the only question is, whether in the case before us this was done with the intention of constituting an irrevocable discharge. On the evidence, I cannot doubt that such was Mr Paton's intention, and that the deed of discharge was in legal effect a delivered deed.

It has then to be considered whether Mr Paton had the power to discharge his legitim, and thus to prevent this valuable right coming into the possession of his creditors. Now, there is this difference between a fraud on creditors and fraudulent acts of the ordinary type, that an act may be have no active rights in the spes successionis, and must allow events to bring the succession their way or not to bring it their way. It is another and a very different thing to say that by overt act the bankrupt may of design interfere to intercept and divert a succession from ever by possibility coming to meet his debts. The transfer of his estate by sequestration from himself to his trustee does not in principle absolve the bankrupt from that equitable duty to his creditors which the law has more frequent occasion to recognise in the initial state of insolvency. And while the law will not compel a bankrupt to assign a spes successionis to his creditors, it may well, if this be in accordance with the spirit of the other restrictions on bankrupts, forbid them to do any act in relation to a spes successionis which is, and is intended to be, to the prejudice of creditors. Now, the facts of the present case are very gross, and while they must not bias the determination of what is a general question, yet they illustrate what are the realities of the question. A bankrupt, partly out of spite to his creditors, and partly to benefit himself and his family, gratuitously discharges a right of legitim worth several thousand pounds, when the father is on his deathbed. No one can doubt that the creditors are prejudiced; and no one can deny that the act is fraudulent—that word being one of morals. I am prepared to hold that given an act of a bankrupt having those qualities and effects, it does not matter whether it operates on what is at the time or only on what may possibly come to be a part of the bankrupt's estate.

4. The remaining question in the case is whether the syndic who sues the reduction so represents the creditors (whom I now assume to be prejudiced) as to have a good instance. The evidence as to French law places it beyond doubt that according to that law the syndic has not merely the rights of the bankrupt, but that he represents creditors in the fullest sense.

This being so, the only objection suggested to his title is that this Court ought not to recognise the sequestration by decree of a French Court of the estates of one, who, although trading in France, is for purposes of succession a domiciled Scotchman. The refusal to recognise a sequestration in bankruptcy which is valid by the law of the country in which it has been granted can only be justified on the ground that it is contrary to the principles of Scotch law when dealing with international rights to recognise the sequestration of a foreigner. But the fact is that our own law takes no account of the domicile of succession when asked to sequester the estates of a trader, but on the contrary habitually and deliberately sequesters the estates of foreigners who carry on business in this country. It seems difficult to the degree of impossibility for this Court to decline on principle to recognise if done abroad what it is itself bound to do and does daily at home. I may add that in the cases cited by the reclaimers, the word domicile does not seem to have been used with reference to succession at all, and accordingly furnishes no support to the reclaimers' argument.

I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—I entirely concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, and only desire to add a few words expressing my general view on the chief points of the case.—

The first question in the order of the arguments relates to the effect which the Courts of Scotland are entitled and bound to accord to a foreigner in bankruptcy, and the claim instituted by its administrator.

In considering this question it is well to bear in mind that, under the statutory law of bankruptcy which we administer, a foreigner who carries on business in Scotland, and who is unable to pay his debts, is liable to have his estates put under sequestration, and further that the subject of sequestration is the estate of the bankrupt wherever situated. In the case supposed, it would be the duty of a Scottish trustee for creditors to take proceedings in the native country of the bankrupt for the recovery, with a view to distribution, of any bequest or right of succession that might accrue to the bankrupt during the currency of the sequestration. In this state of our municipal law I think we cannot be wrong in recognising the same right in the French syndic which we should claim for the Scottish trustee in the parallel case.

The principle of international comity has been liberally admitted by our Courts in bankruptcy cases, and I apprehend that in sustaining the title of the French syndic we are maintaining the principle on which this Court has acted in past times. It is of course inevitable that there should be differences of opinion or expression on such a question amongst the writers who profess to treat this subject from a purely philosophic point of view, but these differences are perhaps more apparent than real; and when it is said that the Court of the domicile is the proper Court of bankruptcy, I think this must be understood to mean a trading domicile. In principle, I cannot doubt that every trader who is unable to pay his debts is liable to have his estate seized and divided amongst his creditors by judicial authority in the country where he carries on his business, because every state has the right of enforcing the performance of the obligations of those who enjoy the protection of its laws. When this is done, there is an obvious convenience in giving a wide extension to the powers of the trustee or administrator in bankruptcy, so that the bankrupt may not be harassed by the conflicting claims of separate administrations.

The claim of the syndic is to receive and administer the legitim to which Mr Paton was prospectively entitled in his father's lifetime, and which he contends became vested in the bankrupt on the death of his father. This claim is disputed on the ground that a few days before the father's death the son discharged the legitim. The deed of discharge was not actually delivered, but was recorded in the Register of Deeds for preservation. It is settled law that the delivery of a deed into neutral custody with the intention of putting the deed out of the grantor's power and conferring an irrevocable right on the grantee, is equivalent to the delivery of the deed to the grantee himself. The recording of a deed in a public register satisfies the required conditions, and the only question is, whether in the case before us this was done with the intention of constituting an irrevocable discharge. On the evidence, I cannot doubt that such was Mr Paton's intention, and that the deed of discharge was in legal effect a delivered deed.

It has then to be considered whether Mr Paton had the power to discharge his legitim, and thus to prevent this valuable right coming into the possession of his creditors. Now, there is this difference between a fraud on creditors and fraudulent acts of the ordinary type, that an act may be

No. 132. a fraud on creditors which is perfectly innocent in itself, or even laudable if done by a solvent person, because the fraud consists in the violation of the principle that an insolvent is a virtual trustee for his creditors, and is disabled from dealing with his estate so as to defeat or imperil their right to distribution.

Mar. 17, 1897.
Obers v.
Trustees.

The Statutes of 1621 and 1696 are only aids to the discovery of and restoration against fraud by means of certain presumptions which these statutes establish. But the right of creditors to restoration against fraudulent alienation is independent of statute, and I think that the principle has sufficient strength and consistency to prevail over any device by which an insolvent person seeks to secure a benefit to himself, his relatives, or other favoured persons, by putting away funds which, but for his interference, would be available for the liquidation of his debts.

The act of Mr Paton in discharging his legitim has been defended on the ground that according to the decision in Reid v. Morison,¹ the trustee or syndic could not have sold Mr Paton's expectancy in his father's lifetime. But this statement of the law is incomplete if we do not add to it that the trustee, and the body of creditors whose interests he represents, have a right to the chance of the succession falling in during the currency of the sequestration. The Bankruptcy Act, as interpreted, and I think rightly interpreted, in Reid v. Morison,¹ does not treat a spes successionis as a saleable subject for division amongst creditors; and it may very well be that it was not thought consistent with the temperate character of modern bankruptcy legislation that a valuable future right should be sacrificed for the purpose of producing a relatively small sum for immediate division. But if this be the motive of the exception, it lends no support to the claim of the defender that he is to be entitled to give away his right of succession in order to defeat the expectancy of his creditors contingent on the succession falling in before he has got his discharge. Now, if it be a fraud, as it certainly is, to give a preference in satisfaction of a just debt to the detriment of other creditors, it cannot be an honest thing to give away a valuable expectancy which in the natural course of events would come to creditors; and I conclude as I began by saying that it is the interference on the part of the insolvent with his creditors' right to a distribution of his estate which constitutes the fraud. I am therefore of opinion that the deed of discharge is ineffectual in a question with creditors, and that the interlocutor of 16th March 1895 ought to be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordships.

THE COURT adhered.

M'Lachlan v. Assessor for Ayr.

ON 6th March 1896, James M'Lachlan, builder, Ayr, proprietor of the Hotel Dalblair, Ayr, entered into a contract of copartnership with Hugh Buchanan and John Hay O'Beirne, in which the parties agreed to become lessees of the premises to be known as "Hotel Dalblair," with equal rights in the profits. On 18th March 1896 M'Lachlan let the hotel to himself, Buchanan, and O'Beirne as trustees for the company or firm known as "Hotel Dalblair Company, Ayr," for five years, at the yearly rent of £100. Case 182.

M'Lachlan, Buchanan, and O'Beirne, as tenants of the hotel in question, appealed against the entry by the Assessor in the Valuation-roll of the hotel, at the rent of £200, and certain accessory buildings at £20.

The appellants craved that the valuation be reduced to £100 a year, at which the subjects were let in the lease.

The Valuation Committee reduced the valuation of the hotel to £155, and dismissed the appeal as regards the other buildings.

M'Lachlan obtained a case. The case stated that the lease and the contract of copartnership had been produced.

"It was admitted in evidence that in the spring of 1895 Mr M'Lachlan had let the subjects then known as Dalblair House for the purpose of a hotel to John Campbell, confectioner, Ayr, at a rent of £150 per annum, provided a licence could be obtained from the magistrates. This arrangement fell through in consequence of the magistrates refusing to license the premises. In autumn of last year Mr M'Lachlan applied for and obtained a hotel licence from the magistrates in his own favour. . . . During the eight or nine months that elapsed between the granting of the licence and the opening of the hotel extensive alterations and improvements were made, and additional accommodation was erected, so as to meet the requirements of a first-class hotel trade. These alterations, improvements, and additions were made at the expense of Mr M'Lachlan as proprietor, but he could not say what they cost. Mr John Hay O'Beirne is a son-in-law of Mr M'Lachlan."

Argued for the appellants;—The rent fixed in the lease must rule the valuation, unless the lease was not a bona fide lease, or unless there were considerations other than rent. The only ground on which the bona fides of the lease could be challenged was the relationship between the landlord and one of the tenants. That, however, had been held¹ not per se to constitute a consideration other than the rent. The hotel was a new venture, and the rent was quite properly low.

Argued for the Assessor;—The relationship between M'Lachlan and O'Beirne, coupled with the fact that the rent was much below the adequate value of the hotel, was sufficient to entitle the Committee to disregard the lease. In an unreported case in 1895—Stevenson and Others—a lease had been disregarded as being a family arrangement.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case the magistrates have disregarded the lease

No. 133. under which it is admitted that the premises are at present let. Now I think that they can only do that upon one of two grounds. They may hold that the lease is not a bona fide lease, or they may hold that there are considerations passing between the parties other than the rent stipulated in the lease.

Mar. 17, 1897.
M'Lachlan v.
Assessor for Ayr.

The question is, whether we have anything before us to justify a disregard of the lease upon either of these grounds. Now I quite concede that where a lease is impeached as not being a bona fide lease it may be so on various grounds. It may be inferred, for instance, from the whole facts—from the amount of the rent stipulated as compared with the previous rent—from the relationship of the parties—from the interest of the landlord in the tenancy, &c., &c., that the lease was not a real and bona fide lease. We have had examples of that in this Court, in cases where it appeared that the landlord and tenant were in substance the same person. We had lately a case, where a lease between marriage trustees on the one hand, and the husband and wife on the other, was held to be for the purposes of the Valuation Act no lease at all, the interest on both sides being the same. But I am not aware that we have ever held that the mere fact that the landlord was a partner in the concern to which the lease was granted was sufficient to displace the rent fixed by the lease as the rule of value. The presumption I should think is, that a landlord will exact from his partners the best rent he can get, just as he will probably do so from other people. It may be a different case if his interest in the partnership is such as to make the amount of rent practically immaterial. But the landlord here is one among three, and has only one-third of the profits, and I cannot hold that in such circumstances the mere fact of his partnership is sufficient to displace the lease.

Then, again, is there any evidence that the rent stipulated is not conditioned as a fair rent? In other words, does it appear that there is some consideration other than the rent paid by the firm to the landlord? I can see none. All that appears is that the landlord receives a rent which is somewhat below what the Assessor and the magistrates think adequate. But I am afraid that that often happens, especially in cases like this, where old premises are being converted to a new and experimental use. In any case, mere inadequacy of rent is no sufficient reason for holding either that the lease is not a bona fide lease, or that there are considerations payable to the landlord other than the stipulated rent.

I am therefore for sustaining the appeal, and fixing the valuation at the rent stipulated in the lease.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was wrong, and that the rent stipulated in the lease fell to be entered.

 Mackay v.

Valuation Acts—Crofter—Fair Rent—Crofter Proprietor—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29), sec. 6.—A crofter, the rent of whose farm had been fixed at a fair rent by the Crofters Commission, purchased his holding. The Assessor, assuming that the fair rent represented only the landlord's interest in the croft, added thereto, in fixing the valuation, a sum representing the annual value of permanent improvements on the holding.

Held that the valuation was right.

Question as to the rule of valuation where the crofter has not purchased his holding.

JOHN MACKAY, Aultririe, Brora, appealed against a decision of the Lands Valuation Committee of the county of Sutherland, under the following circumstances, which were stated by the Committee in a case for appeal:—"The appellant is proprietor of subjects in the parish of Clyne, consisting of 16 acres of land, of which about 8 acres are arable and 8 acres pasture outrun; a right to graze a certain amount of stock on the adjacent pasture in common with the surrounding crofters, and also of the following buildings thereon:—Dwelling-house—stone and slated—having two rooms and two attics, barn, byre, and stable—stone and lime, and covered with corrugated iron—all of which he recently purchased from his Grace the Duke of Sutherland for £44.

Case 180.

"The appellant, prior to his purchase of the subjects, occupied them as a crofter under the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, at a rent of £2, 8s., being the fair rent fixed by the Crofters Commission under the said Act, and the tenancy of the croft had been in the family for several generations.

"The dwelling-house was re-erected by the appellant about twelve years ago, the landlord supplying lime and timber, and the barn, byre, and stable were also re-erected by the appellant about a year ago, the landlord supplying the timber. All the arable land on the croft was reclaimed by the appellant or his predecessors in the same family. . . .

"The Assessor fixed the valuation of the subjects at £8, contending that he was bound to assume that the fair rent of £2, 8s. referred to, fixed by the Crofters Commission under section 6 (1) of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, was the rent of the croft in question after deducting from its value all permanent improvements made by the crofter or his predecessors in the same family, but that in valuing the appellant's property he had to do so in terms of section 6 of the Valuation Act of 1854, which provides that 'in estimating the yearly value of land and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year'; that after visiting the premises he had considered that £5, 12s. represented the annual value in the market of the permanent improvements made by the appellant and his predecessors in the same family, and that accordingly he had added that sum to the fair rent fixed by the Crofters Commission; that fair rent, when fixed, merely representing the landlord's interest in the croft.

"The Valuation Committee, having considered the evidence adduced, . . . were of opinion that the principle adopted by the Assessor in valuing the appellant's property was right, but that the rent at which the subjects 'might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year' was £6, 10s., and they reduced the Assessor's valuation accordingly."

Argued for the appellant;—The Assessor had no sufficient grounds to warrant him in departing from the fair rent fixed by the Commission. There was no allegation of any change of circumstances or of additional buildings having been erected which fell to be taken into account. The Assessor's valuation involved the result that the landlord of a crofting property would be rated at a much higher rental than he actually received. There was no reason why the assessment should be raised because the crofter had purchased his holding.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I do not think we require to hear anything more in this case. It seems to me the clearest possible case, and it is not necessary to say more than that I entirely agree with the views expressed by the Assessor and by the Valuation Committee.

I may, however, add that I desire to reserve my opinion upon the question whether—but for the purchase of his croft by this crofter—the rule of valuation would, upon the just construction of the Valuation Act, have been the same or different. It may be that that Act cannot be so construed as to subject a landlord to be rated upon a rent or upon a valuation larger than the rent which he receives. But, on the other hand, it may be that, for the purposes of the Valuation Act, the "fair rents," fixed upon special principles by the Crofters Commission, are not yearly rents conditioned as the fair annual value of the subjects,—that is to say, of the subjects as they stand. As I have said, I express no opinion on that question, which, when it arises, will require to be carefully considered with reference both to the provisions of the Valuation Act and of the Crofters Act.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I entirely agree with your Lordship and with the Valuation Committee.

Lanarkshire.

A tenant of certain seams of fireclay and quarries of rotten rock and freestone rock under a lease which stipulated for a fixed rent or for a royalty on every ton of these minerals carried away, erected certain kilns in which the rotten rock and freestone rock, after being quarried, was dried, and also certain buildings containing two boilers, an engine, and pan-mills, in which the fireclay, rotten rock, and freestone rock were ground.

Held (1) that these erections did not fall within the meaning of exemption 2, in respect that they were used for converting the minerals on which the royalty was payable into a finished product; and (2) that they did not fall under exemption 3, in respect that the royalty was not calculated upon the finished product, but upon the raw mineral.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire held on 11th September 1896, the Gartverrie Fireclay Company, Glenboig, appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll:—

and craved that the reference to the Fireclay Works should be struck out of the roll, and the valuation reduced to £13, 10s.

The Committee sustained the valuation, and at the request of the appellants stated a case for the Appeal Court, which contained the following statements:—"By lease entered into between the trustees of the late John Hamilton Colt, Esq. of Gartsherrie, and the Gartverrie Fireclay Company, the said trustees let to the partners of the Gartverrie Fireclay Company, as trustees for their firm, 'All and Whole the beds or seams of fire-clay in parts of the lands of Castleskails, Gartverrie, and Rawmoan . . . as also the quarries of rotten rock or freestone sand and freestone rock, as then being worked in the said lands . . . and that for the space of nineteen years from Martinmas 1876 . . . with full power to the lessees to search for, work, win, raise, manufacture, and carry away the fireclay and rotten rock, or freestone sand and freestone rock thereby let, and for these ends to set down pits and sinks, and to drive levels for working the said fireclay and other minerals foresaid, and to erect machinery for draining and bringing up the same.'

"The rent payable under said lease was a fixed rent of £150 per annum, or, in the option of the lessors, a lordship or royalty of 6d. for each ton of 20 cwt. of fireclay, and 3d. for each ton of 20 cwt. of rotten rock or freestone sand and freestone rock excavated and carried away in virtue hereof. A copy of the said lease, with relative minute of extension, is herewith produced.

"The fireclay works referred to in the entry in the Valuation-roll appealed against consist of (1) certain kilns or stoves in which the rotten rock or freestone sand and freestone rock, after being quarried, are dried; and (2) certain buildings, containing two boilers, an engine, and pan-mills, in which the fireclay and the said rotten rock or freestone sand and freestone rock are ground.

Gartverrie
Fireclay Co.
v. Assessor for
Lanarkshire.

"The buildings and machinery in question were voluntarily erected by the lessees, and are used exclusively in connection with the fire-clay and other minerals let under the lease."

Argued for the appellants;—The erections were used exclusively for the purpose, not of converting the minerals into a finished product, but of working and cleaning them.¹ They fell then within the second exemption of section 4² of the Act of 1895, and ought not to be entered in the Valuation-roll. In any view, they fell within the third exemption.² The lordship was only to be paid upon the minerals carried away. That implied "treatment," because they could only be carried away after they had been dried. In order to bring them within this exemption it was unnecessary that a different lordship should be exacted by the lessor on minerals treated in the erections from that exacted on minerals not so treated.

Argued for the Assessor;—The only question decided in the Portobello case¹ was whether clay was a "mineral" within the meaning of the second exemption. The case, then, was not in point as regarded the question here. The second exemption referred to erections which were necessary for working and cleaning the minerals before they could become available for assessment at all. Here the erections were used for the purpose of turning the minerals into a finished product, and thus the second exemption did not apply. The third exemption was also inapplicable, because the lordship was calculated on the weight of mineral carried away, and was the same whether the tenant dried and ground the clay and rock or not.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This company are tenants of certain beds or seams of fireclay, and quarries of rotten rock and freestone rock under a lease for a period of years, "with full power to the lessees to search for, work, win, raise, manufacture, and carry away the fireclay, and rotten rock, and freestone rock, and for these ends to set down pits and sinks, and to drive levels for working the said fireclay and other minerals foresaid, and to erect machinery for draining and bringing up the same." They have erected upon the subjects of the lease certain kilns or stoves in which we are told the rotten rock after being quarried is dried, and also certain buildings containing two boilers, an engine, and pan-mills, in which the fireclay and rotten rock are ground.

The question is whether these erections are liable to assessment under the provisions of the Act of 1895. The purpose of that Act—as I understand it—was to bring within the ambit of assessment erections made by tenants which were not contemplated by the lease, and which had the effect of adding to the value of the subjects. There are certain exceptions from the leading enactment; and the real question here is whether the erections in question fall within either of these exceptions. The first which is founded on is subsection 2 of section 4, to the effect that the section shall not apply to any erections for the purpose of working and cleaning minerals. And we are asked to say that these erections are for that purpose. Now, I think it clearly appears from the statement in the case that they are not. Erections for working and cleaning minerals are very intelligibly excepted from the statute, because they are necessary to make the minerals available for the purpose of assessment, and without them it would be impossible to assess the minerals at all. But a totally different rule applies where the erections are made for the purpose of converting the minerals into a finished product, which presumably is more valuable to the lessees. Accordingly, all such erections are now liable to assessment, unless they fall under the exception provided by subsection 3, which relates to coke ovens and other structures in which minerals are "treated," and where the rent or lordship stipulated in the lease is calculated upon the coke or other finished product.

The second question, therefore, is whether the erections with which we have here to deal fall within that description. I am clearly of opinion that they do not. The reason of the exception is that, if the royalty is paid upon the finished product, it would be quite inequitable to add anything to what the tenant had already paid in that shape. But, if the effect of his erections is to turn out a finished product, in respect of which he presumably gets a higher price in the market, but for which he has to pay no higher royalty, then one can understand the purpose of the Act in rendering such erections liable to assessment. Now, I think, the erections here are of the latter description, viz., for the purpose of turning out a finished product for which no higher rent is payable, and, accordingly, I think we ought to find that the determination of the Committee is right.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I entirely agree with everything your Lordship has said, and I have only to add, what was conceded at the bar, that, in the Portobello case¹ decided last year, this question was not raised, and was therefore not before the Court.

The Valuation Committee having sustained the valuation, the appellant obtained a case for the Appeal Court.

The facts above narrated were admitted. The case further stated:—

“The appellant contended that the farm-house and offices are ‘necessary adjuncts’ of the farm, and vice versa, and therefore for valuation purposes must be regarded as an unum quid, and that therefore the proportion of said rent effeiring to said 9 acres included within the said special water and drainage district of Culter falls to be ascertained by the simple proportion question: If 223 acres give £284, 4s. 6d., what do 9 acres give?”

“In answer, the Assessor stated that he admitted the acreage of the farm to be 223, of which 26 were situated in Drumoak and 197 in Peterculter; that the rent applicable to the part within the parish of Peterculter was £254, 4s. 6d., and that the extent of the farm within the Culter special water and drainage district was 9 acres. He maintained, however, that, owing to the formation of the Culter Special District, the part of the farm in Peterculter parish was now to be regarded as if it were situated in two parishes for certain purposes, and that the rental fell to be allocated upon that footing. In making such allocations, the Assessor stated that the system adopted has been to ascertain the value of the farm buildings, to deduct that amount from the gross rent of the farm, and, subject to such deduction, to ascertain the rate per acre of the land, entering the value of the farm buildings within whichever parish they are situated.”

Argued for the appellant;—The Assessor’s principle of valuation was erroneous. He should have taken the farm as a whole and then discovered the value of 9 acres. No one would be willing to pay the value fixed upon for the farm buildings if he were not to have the farm.¹

Argued for the Assessor;—The principle adopted by him had been recognised in the case of a ferry and hotel situated in two counties,² and it was the same in the valuation of water-works.³

At advising,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—By section 45 (1) of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, the Assessor is directed to distinguish in the Valuation-roll lands and heritages situated within the boundaries of any special water and drainage district. The question here is,—On what principle he is to do this, where a special district includes part of an ordinary arable farm, and that part contains the farm-house and steading?

What the Assessor has done, and the Valuation Committee have sustained, is to put a value on the farm buildings and to deduct that sum from the gross rent of the farm, leaving the reduced amount to represent the rate per acre of the land. This farm consists of 223 acres, and the rent is about £284, or a little over 25s. an acre, taking the buildings into account. Of these 223 acres, 26 are situated in the parish of Drumoak and 197 in the parish of Peterculter. But the special district has been carved out of the parish of Peterculter, and it contains 9 acres of the farm, including the farm buildings. There are thus 26 acres in Drumoak, 188 acres in Peterculter proper, and 9 acres in the special district. The effect of what the Assessor has done is to leave the valuation of the portion in Drumoak at or about the overhead rate of 25s. an acre, but to reduce the rate of the portion in Peterculter proper to rather less than £1 per acre, and to make the valuation of the portion in the special district (when tested by acreage) a little over £7, 15s. an acre, the increase in the latter case being accounted for by the arbitrary value put on the buildings. The appellant maintains that this is an erroneous principle of apportionment, and that the proper principle is to treat the farm buildings as adjuncts of the land, and to ascertain the value of the portion in the special district by the overhead rate per acre.

Forbes Irvine
v. Assessor for
shire.

The subjects being bona fide let for a yearly rent, it is obvious that there is no room for the ascertainment of value apart from the rent. Any valuation of a portion of the subjects must therefore be by way of apportioning the rent, which is necessarily a purely hypothetical proceeding where the lease itself contains no such apportionment. It is certain that the tenant would not have given so much rent if there had been no buildings, but how much less he would have given (or, in other words, how much value he put on the buildings) is pure speculation.

I am of opinion that the proper principle is that for which the appellant contends, and which the Assessor himself seems to have followed when the only apportionment required was one between the two parishes. If it could be said that the farm buildings were of exceptional value and unsuited to the farm, the case might be different, but where, as here, the buildings must be presumed to be ordinary and suitable, it seems to me that they ought to be regarded as a mere adjunct of the land, and that there is no more reason for attempting to put a separate value upon them than for putting a higher value on particular fields because they happen to consist of better land than others. The whole farm is truly one subject. Nor do I think that it makes any difference that the necessity for apportionment is caused by the creation of a special water and drainage district.

I am confirmed in this view by the case of Henderson,¹ where the Appeal Court overruled a proposal of the Assessor to value the dwelling-house and offices of a farm apart from the land. The farm in that case was all in one parish, but there was a higher classification for dwelling-houses than for agricultural subjects as regards poor-rates, and therefore the proprietor (who was also occupier) conceived that he had an interest to dispute the breaking-up of the value. The ground of decision was applicable to the present case, viz., that the house was a "necessary adjunct" of the farm.

I am therefore of opinion that the valuation within the Culter special district should be altered to £11, 9s. 6d., a corresponding increase being made in the valuation within the parish of Peterculter proper.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur.

No. 137. INCORPORATION OF SKINNERS AND FURRIERS IN EDINBURGH, Pursuers.
—Rankine—Irvine.

Mar. 17, 1897.
Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers
in Edinburgh
v. Baxter's Heir.

THE HEIR-AT-LAW AND REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN BAXTER AND THE LIEGES, Defenders.

Writ—Disposition of Heritage—Proving the Tenor—Requisite Adminicles.
—Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant decree of proving the tenor of a deed, in respect that no evidence of the particular terms of the essential clauses of the deed was adduced.

1ST DIVISION. THIS was a summons of proving the tenor at the instance of the Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers in Edinburgh. The action was directed against the heir-at-law and representatives of the deceased John Baxter, slater in Edinburgh, and the lieges, and the deed of which the pursuers sought to have the tenor proved was a disposition by John Baxter in their favour of a shop and wareroom in the High Street of Edinburgh, dated in 1812. No testing-clause was included in the deed contained in the summons, the summons simply concluding for decree that the said disposition was duly subscribed and attested in 1812.

The pursuers stated that the description of the property given in the disposition set forth in the summons was taken chiefly from the titles of the property adjoining that of the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary having made great avizandum to the First Division, a proof before answer was allowed. Excerpts were produced from the minute-book of the pursuers' Incorporation, which shewed that they had purchased a shop in the High Street from Mr Baxter in 1812.

A disposition by John Baxter to Thomas Miller of a wareroom flat "immediately above that shop sold by me to the said Thomas Miller, and that other shop sold by me to the Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers in Edinburgh," bore that "the whole writings of the said subjects were delivered up by me to John Bathgate" and others "on behalf of the said Incorporation."

A minute of meeting of the Incorporation of 23d March 1837 stated that the boxes containing the title-deeds and other papers belonging to the Incorporation were in the possession of the boxmaster (Deacon Miller), but from a minute of meeting of 9th February 1849 it appeared that the papers in possession of Mr Miller's successor did not include any title-deeds, and none had been afterwards discovered. The Incorporation had remained in undisturbed possession of the premises.

Argued for the pursuers;—The tenor of the deed and the casus amissionis were sufficiently proved. The documentary evidence shewed that the pursuers had purchased the premises, which they had since possessed without disturbance, in 1812, and that the writs, which had been delivered to the officials of the Incorporation, had been lost by them. The Court would dispense with actual proof of the terms of clauses of style, and when a deed had been acted on without dispute for a number of years proof of the testing-clause would not be insisted on.¹ As the deed in question referred to land, the presumption was that it had been duly executed. The deed No. 137. being a simple disposition, and the rights of third parties not being involved, the Court would not require detailed written adminicles. Mar. 17, 1897. Parole proof had been held sufficient to set up a testamentary deed dealing with heritage.¹ Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers in Edinburgh v. Baxter's Heir.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action for proving the tenor of a disposition alleged to have been executed so long ago as 1812 of certain subjects in the High Street of Edinburgh in favour of the Incorporation of Skinners and Furriers. The deed, if it ever had any existence, was discovered to have gone amissing so long ago as the year 1849, and it is a little to be regretted that the pursuers, when they discovered that their title was not to be found, did not, when matters were comparatively fresh and the deed and documents alleged to have been lost might have been more easily traced, take steps to have it replaced, as one would naturally have expected them to do. However, they have come to the Court now, and it is obvious that evidence both of the tenor of the deed and of the casus amissionis might then have been got which are not now available.

Now, it is the fact that ever since the date of the alleged deed the subjects alleged to have been conveyed thereby have been occupied by the Incorporation, and looking to the nature of the deed, I quite agree with the pursuers' counsel that the presumption in favour of its having been duly executed ought to prevail, and also that in such a case we are not bound to require proof of the actual fact of the destruction of the deed, if there is sufficient evidence to shew that it has been searched for in the proper quarters and after due search cannot be found. I would consider such a casus amissionis, if proved, sufficient, but the first difficulty is as to whether the deed ever existed. The only evidence of its existence which we have is a statement by the granter in a disposition to an adjoining proprietor, who held his property apparently under the same series of titles, that he had granted such a disposition. That is very slight evidence of the existence of the deed. No doubt the pursuers have possessed the subjects alleged to have been disposed ever since the date of the alleged disposition, and we might consider that sufficient evidence that the disposition was in fact granted, but the evidence would go no further than to prove that the deed once was in existence, and would not shew its terms. Assuming the existence of the deed to have been proved, we might presume that it was executed with the solemnities necessary to its existence as a valid deed, but proof of its existence would carry us no further than this. It would not tell us what the terms of the deed were, and would bring us a very small way towards proof of the tenor of the deed set forth in the summons. Now, there are no adminicles in this case at all. The deed was not put on record, and from first to last the deed in the summons is a construction of the pursuers' imagination. I should not hesitate to agree with Mr Rankine that, if we have proof of the essential clauses of a deed, we may supply mere clauses of style, but then we have no proof of the essential parts of this deed; and accordingly I come to the conclusion—though I would be willing to assist the pursuers in the matter—that we cannot grant the decree they crave.

No. 137. LORD M'LAREN.—The corporation, who are the pursuers in this action, need have no apprehension that they will be disturbed in the occupation of this hall, of which they have been in possession since 1812, because if any competitor chooses to set up an ancient title against them, he will be barred by the negative prescription. It does not follow because it is proved that the pursuers have been in possession for this period of years under some title, that the Court has jurisdiction to reconstruct a title, virtually to grant a title which shall serve as a foundation of prescriptive right. Parties may do this for themselves—the simplest way would be for the corporation to grant a disposition to trustees giving a title which would become indefeasible in twenty years. Another possible way would be adjudication on a trust bond. But it appears to me that the method adopted here is insufficient, for, while we might conclude that there had been some title, and might even hold the casus amissionis established, because the deed was traced to the possession of an office-bearer, after whose death nothing further was heard of it, the case fails because no proof has been offered of the terms of the deed. I must altogether dissent from Mr Irvine's proposition that in all cases it is unnecessary to prove the testing-clause of a deed whose tenor is in question. I may say, with all respect to the case in Robertson's Appeals, that we have no means of knowing from the report whether the reversal was on law or on fact. It may be that slight evidence will be sufficient to set up a testing-clause. If a lawyer who had the custody of a deed should say that he remembers that it was a duly executed deed, because he had occasion to examine it for some purpose, but that he cannot remember the names of the instrumentary witnesses, we should most probably consider the evidence sufficient. Or if an instrument of sasine set forth that a dispositive deed was presented for the purpose of sasine being given in terms of the warrant, we might take this as evidence that the warrant was duly attested. I am not prepared to say that, where the purpose of an action is to set up a deed whose execution is in dispute we could dispense with the evidence of execution which is furnished by a testing-clause. But I need not elaborate this point, because there is no evidence as to the existence of other essential clauses in the deed supposed, nothing even to shew that it contained dispositive words. There is neither draft, nor copy, nor excerpt to enable us to find in fact that a deed existed expressed in the terms set forth in the summons.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with what has been said. I think that in dismissing this action we are doing nothing to throw any doubt on the right of the corporation to the property of the subjects which have been so long in their possession; and it is, as your Lordships have indicated, very probable that there may be means available to them for making a good title, though it is not for us to suggest or consider what is the most appropriate method for that purpose. But however that may be, I agree that there is no evidence to justify our granting decree of declarator that the disposition was duly executed and delivered, that it has been lost in such circumstances as to justify a proving of the tenor, and that its terms were those set forth in the summons. The evidence as to the execution and delivery of the disposition is very imperfect, though I think it probable that it was so executed and delivered. But that would not be enough to support a decree of proving the tenor. Even assuming the execution of a deed in some terms suitable for the conveyance of a property, there is no evidence of the particular terms of the deed, and no sufficient ground for a decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Duncan.

Reparation—Apprehension without a warrant—Police-Constable.—A married woman living in Edinburgh brought an action against a detective in the Edinburgh police for damages on account of his having wrongfully compelled her to accompany him to the police-office. The pursuer averred that her son, a boy of twelve, having found some clinical thermometers in the street, brought them to her; and that while she and her husband were taking means to discover whether the thermometers were of any value the defender came to her house, and after charging her with having come by the thermometers dishonestly, forcibly, and without a warrant, compelled her to accompany him to the police-office, where, after a short examination, she was discharged; and that the defender had acted wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) had held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue laid upon malice and want of probable cause.

The Court (rev. the judgment) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Reparation—Slander—Police-Constable—Privilege.—In an action of damages for alleged slander, brought by a woman against a detective-officer, the pursuer averred that the defender came to her house and insisted on her accompanying him to the police-office, and repeatedly, and in a loud voice, in the presence and hearing of another detective and of her two sons, called her a "resetter" of certain articles which one of her sons had found in the street.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Low) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

In January 1897 Mrs Teresa Kussick or Malcolm, wife of and residing with James Malcolm, cabman, 10 Brown Square, Chambers Street, Edinburgh, with consent of her husband, raised an action against William Duncan, detective-officer in the Edinburgh police, concluding for £500 as damages.

2^d Division.
Lord Low.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "About ten o'clock on the night of 18th December 1896 the pursuer's son, John Malcolm, a boy aged twelve, found in Guthrie Street, Edinburgh, among some refuse, a number of clinical thermometers. Several of them had been broken, but there remained ten whole ones. These he picked up and carried home. On the way home he gave one to a girl, Emily Sutherland, who also resides at said No. 10 Brown Square, and after he got home he handed the remaining nine to the pursuer, who shewed them to her husband. The pursuer and her husband did not know what the articles were or whether they were of any value, but it was arranged that the pursuer's husband should on the following day take them to Mr Hume, instrument-maker in Lothian Street—the said James Malcolm's stance being in College Street adjoining—to ascertain whether they were of any value. It was the intention of the pursuer and her

No. 138. husband, if the found property were of any value, to take steps to restore same to the rightful owners thereof."

Mar. 17, 1897.
Malcolm v.
Duncan.

(Cond. 3) "On the following afternoon, viz. 19th December, the pursuer, as she had not received any message from her husband in regard to the said articles which he had in terms of said arrangement taken away with him about two hours previous, sent her daughter Annie Malcolm to Malcolm's stance in College Street to see her father about the matter. The girl there ascertained that her father had gone to Powderhall with a 'fare,' and returning home told the pursuer so. The pursuer accordingly obtained from the said Emily Sutherland the said thermometer which had been given to her, and thereafter sent her son Robert Malcolm, a lad about fifteen years age, to Mr Stevenson, instrument-maker in Forrest Road, Edinburgh, with it, to make the same inquiries as it had been arranged her husband should make at Hume's, in order to have information before the shops would be closed on Saturday afternoon. She also gave her son a note or line to hand to Mr Stevenson, which was in these terms:—'Please would you be kind enough to let me know if this article is of any value, as my boy found a parcel containing some of them, if they are worth advertising, and oblige, yours respectfully, T. MALCOLM.' The boy Robert Malcolm took the thermometer and the note to Mr Stevenson. Mr Stevenson having read the note and examined the thermometer sent for a policeman. After the policeman came Mr Stevenson gave him the said note and the thermometer, and informed him that he believed the said article was part of property reported to have been stolen. The said Robert Malcolm told them how the same had come into his brother's possession. The policeman, notwithstanding, took the boy in charge, and marched him to the police-office in High Street, holding him by the wrist all the way. While going to the police-office they passed Chambers Street, where the pursuer lives, and the boy asked the policeman to go with him and see his mother, telling the constable that he would there receive a full explanation. The policeman refused to do so."

(Cond. 4) "After arriving at the police-office the policeman and the boy were interviewed by two detectives, namely, the defender and another detective named Strachan. The defender was then told of the circumstances under which the thermometers had been found, where they were, how the boy had taken one of them to Stevenson's, and he was given the said note from Mrs Malcolm, which is herewith produced. The defender, accompanied by Strachan and the boy, then proceeded to the pursuer's house. The pursuer was not at home when the defender arrived. She was out in quest of her son Robert, the report of his arrest having been brought to her by a boy who knew her son. On arriving at the house the defender saw the pursuer's mother, Mrs Teresa Kussick. The defender said something to her about some thermometers having been stolen. Mrs Kussick expressed surprise. 'Yes, stolen,' the defender said, 'and you know all about them.' He was asked to sit down to await the pursuer's return, but he refused to do so. He proceeded to search the house, and the pursuer's repositories, including three drawers. He then turned over a bed and carpet, and searched an oven, after which he proceeded to search Mrs Kussick's bedroom. This searching of the pursuer's house was done illegally and without any warrant, and was unnecessary and uncalled for, as the defender had received full information in regard to the thermometers, and where they were. There was no reason to suspect that any stolen property was hidden in the said house and repositories. The defender then sent out Strachan to search for the pursuer, who, however, returned to her house before Strachan did. The defender then accused the pursuer of knowing that the thermometers had been come by dishonestly, and said,—‘She would very shortly know that, for she would be locked up in the police-office.’ The pursuer again explained to the defender how the property had been come by, how she had one in her possession, where the others were, and the reason why her husband had taken them away, and she offered to go to Powderhall for them, but the defender nevertheless told her that she must go with him to the police-office, and that he was going to take her there. The pursuer asked to be allowed to walk alone, and not under charge of the defender. Notwithstanding this, the defender assaulted the pursuer by pushing her violently from the kitchen in her house into the house passage, and again from the house passage into the staircase. He then forcibly and against her will compelled her to accompany him to the police-office, and conducted her there along George IV. Bridge and High Street. This occurred between three and four o’clock on the afternoon of Saturday, the said 19th December. The defender and the said detective Strachan are well known to the public as members of the Edinburgh Police Force.”

Malcolm v.
Duncan.

(Cond. 5) “On the way down the stair from the pursuer’s house the pursuer, the defender, and the said Robert Malcolm and John Malcolm were met by Strachan. The defender then falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause, said to the said Strachan, of and concerning the pursuer, and in the presence and hearing of the said Strachan, of the pursuer and of her said two sons, i.e., John Malcolm and Robert Malcolm, or one or more of them, ‘This is the lady that has caused all the trouble, and this’ (John Malcolm) ‘is the boy that stole the articles. He is the thief and she is the resetter,’ or used words of the like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer. The defender, on the way to the police-office, frequently repeated the said false and calumnious accusation, and said that the pursuer was a resetter, and would be put in the lock-up. This he said in a loud voice in the presence and hearing of the persons above mentioned, or one or more of them, and also of persons passing along the street. He spoke in the same fashion all the way along to the police-office, and he kept continually telling the pursuer of what she would receive in the lock-up.”

(Cond. 6) “At the said police-office the pursuer gave her name, address, and age, and again told the circumstances connected with the possession of the property. The defender then proceeded to take the boy John Malcolm apart from his mother and examined him. The boy told him the same story about the finding of the thermometers. The defender thereupon asked him ‘if his mother had not told him to make this story up.’ The defender then threatened the boy with a birching if he would not admit the false accusation of theft and reset made against him and his mother.”

(Cond. 7) “The pursuer was thereafter told she might go, but before she was finally released the detective Strachan took her and her son John to Guthrie Street. There Strachan was shewn by John Malcolm the place where the thermometers had been found by him. On looking about the spot there was found a piece of a broken one, and Strachan took possession thereof. The pursuer was then allowed to return home. The pursuer thereafter saw her husband, and got from him the rest of the thermometers which he had taken to Mr Hume’s, and about which he had made due inquiry, and all the thermometers which the boy John had found were handed over to the police at the said police-office between six and seven o'clock on the same Saturday evening. At the same time, on the pursuer's request, the said note herewith produced, which had been sent to Mr Stevenson, and which had since been in the defender's possession, was redelivered to the pursuer."

(Cond. 8) "The defender acted unreasonably, wrongfully, illegally, maliciously, and without probable cause towards the pursuer. Before going to the pursuer's house he was told the whole facts about the said thermometers, and had possession of the said note. In these circumstances his proceeding to search the pursuer's house without a warrant was unreasonable, wrongful, illegal, malicious, and oppressive. The accusation which he made against the pursuer, to the effect that she was a resetter, was slanderous, malicious, and untrue, and was known to him to be so, and was made without probable cause. In assaulting the pursuer and compelling her to go to the police-office, the defender acted unreasonably, wrongfully, and oppressively, and also maliciously and without probable cause. Further, he had no warrant. The pursuer was a law-abiding citizen with a fixed residence, and the defender had no reason to believe that the pursuer was about to abscond. By the wrongful and unwarrantable actings of the defender, she has suffered grievously in her feelings, and has been damaged in her reputation among her friends and neighbours. Her being marched by the defender to the police-office as condescended on, was witnessed by her neighbours and the public, and the matter has been the cause of talk in the vicinity of her abode. The defender has been called upon to make reparation, but he declines to do so, and thus the present action has been rendered necessary."

In his answers the defender stated that (Ans. 2) "on 16th December 1896 it was reported to the Edinburgh Police that a parcel containing six dozen clinical thermometers of the value of between £8 and £9 had been stolen that morning from a barrow belonging to and in charge of a servant of" certain carriers. "Following upon said report a notice was placed in the information-book, for constables to make inquiry at all chemists and other likely places, with a view of tracing the property reported to be stolen."

The defender further stated,—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the pursuer sent her son, Robert Malcolm, to Mr Stevenson, instrument-maker in Forrest Road, Edinburgh, with a clinical thermometer, which is believed to be one of those reported to have been stolen, and with a note signed 'T. Malcolm,' but without giving any address, asking whether the article was of any value. Said note is referred to for its terms. Admitted that the boy Robert Malcolm took the thermometer and the said note to Mr Stevenson, and that he having read the said note and examined the thermometer sent for a policeman, to whom he gave the note and the thermometer, and stated that he believed the thermometer to be part of the said property reported to have been stolen. Admitted that the said Robert Malcolm gave an account as to how the thermometer came into his brother's possession. Admitted that the policeman took the boy to the police-office to give an explanation. Quoad ultra not known, and not admitted. . . ." (Ans. 4) "Admitted that on arriving at the police-office the boy was asked for an explanation about the thermometers, and stated that they had been found, and that he had taken one with the note to Stevenson's. Admitted that with the view of making further inquiries the defender and another detective named Strachan proceeded No. 138, along with the boy Robert Malcolm to the pursuer's house; that on arriving at the house the pursuer was not in the house . . . Mar. 17, 1897. Malcolm v. Duncan. and that in a few minutes thereafter the pursuer returned to the house Admitted that the defender explained to pursuer the object of the visit, and asked for an explanation as to the thermometers, and where they were. Admitted that the pursuer stated that her husband had taken away the remainder of the thermometers with him. Admitted that the defender requested the pursuer to go to the police-office and make her explanation there, and that she expressed her willingness to go. Admitted that the defender and Strachan are known to some as members of the Edinburgh Police Force. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the pursuer's story given at her house differed in important respects from the boy's story. . . . Explained further that, as the pursuer was unknown to the defender, and lived in one of the most disorderly localities in the city . . . and behaved in a very excited and intemperate manner, he thought it desirable that the pursuer should accompany him to the police-office. The neighbourhood is one where disturbances are common, and many of the residents have frequently to be dealt with by the police. It was utterly impossible in such a neighbourhood for the defender to make the necessary inquiry after the stolen property, which was still amissing, in the midst of the disturbance created by the pursuer, a disturbance which at the time bore all the appearance of having been created for the purpose of obstructing him in the discharge of his duty. The defender's whole object in asking the pursuer to accompany him was in order that he might in the most expeditious manner ascertain the real state of matters in so far as the pursuer and her son's connection with the stolen articles was concerned. She had committed a breach of the peace, and all his efforts to calm her having proved ineffectual, he was left no alternative but to take her to the police-office. She at first expressed her willingness to go, but on reaching the top of the landing outside of her house she again broke out in a violent temper, used abusive language to the defender, seized hold of the side of the staircase and refused to go. The defender then released her hand and said that she must go, and she did. The defender used no violence to her, and could not have behaved with more consideration to her. Any public attention that was called to her on the street was the result of her own behaviour. The defender entertained, and entertains, no malice whatsoever towards the pursuer, and he had probable cause for acting as he did."

The defender further (Ans. 6) admitted that in the police-office "the pursuer and the boy were again questioned as to the thermometers"; and averred (Ans. 8) that the pursuer was "detained only about ten minutes or thereby altogether."

On record the defender founded on the Police Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 72), sec. 12, and the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (43 and 44 Vict. c. cxxxii.), secs. 56 and 327; but at the hearing on the reclaiming note he admitted that these statutes did not give him higher powers than he possessed at common law.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been injured by the wrongful and illegal actings of the defender, she is entitled to reparation as craved, with expenses. (2) The defender having unreasonably, wrongfully, illegally, and maliciously and without probable cause,

The defender pleaded;—(1) No relevant case. (2) The pursuer's averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defender ought to be assoilzied. (3) Privilege. (4) The defender having acted without malice, and with probable cause, and his actings not having been illegal, he ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 5th March 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Low) approved of the following issues for the trial of the cause * :—

“Whether, on or about 19th December 1896, the defender malici-

* “OPINION.—I am of opinion that the pursuer's averments are sufficient to entitle her to have the case sent to trial, and the main question appears to me to be whether she is bound to put malice and want of probable cause in issue.

“The pursuer argued that the defender, by apprehending her and taking her to the police-office without a warrant, acted illegally and altogether beyond his powers as a police-constable, either at common law or under the Police Statutes, and could not therefore plead privilege. The proper issue, the pursuer contended, was one of wrongful apprehension, leaving it to the Judge who presided at the trial to deal with a case of privilege if it arose.

“Now, I think that it is impossible to distinguish with precision the cases in which a police-officer may apprehend without a warrant from those in which he may not do so. The question was very carefully considered in the case of Peggie v. Clark, 7 Macph. 89, which in many respects was not unlike the present, and the Lord President there said,—‘I am of opinion that, under special circumstances, a police-officer is entitled to apprehend without a warrant, and it will always be a question whether the circumstances justify the apprehension.’

“The circumstances, as averred by the pursuer, under which the defender came to take her to the police-office are shortly these :—Upon the night of 18th December the pursuer's son John found in the street a number of clinical thermometers. On the following day the pursuer's husband, who is a cabman, took all the thermometers except one away with him when he went to his work, with the intention of asking an instrument-maker, who had a shop near his stance, about them. In the afternoon of the same day the pursuer, not having heard from her husband, sent another son, Robert, a lad of fifteen, to Mr Stevenson, instrument-maker in Forrest Road, with the remaining thermometer, and a note in the following terms :—‘Please would you be kind enough to let me know if this article is of any value, as my boy found a parcel containing some of them, if they are worth advertising.’

“Mr Stevenson had heard that there had been a theft of clinical thermometers, and accordingly he called a policeman, who took the boy, the note, and the thermometer to the police-office. The defender and another detective named Strachan were on duty there, and having examined the boy, they took him along with them to the pursuer's house. The pursuer was out at the time, and Strachan went to look for her. The pursuer, however, returned to her house before Strachan did, and after an interview with her, the defender took her back with him to the police-office. The pursuer was examined at the police-office, and Strachan then went with her and her son to the place where the thermometers were said to have been found, and a piece of a broken thermometer was there discovered. The pursuer was then allowed to go home.

“Now, in going to the pursuer's house and making inquiries there, I think that the defender was plainly acting within the scope of his duty. There seems to have been, in fact, a theft of clinical thermometers, and the circumstances under which Robert Malcolm came to Mr Stevenson's shop ously and without probable cause apprehended the pursuer in her house at No. 10 Brown Square, Edinburgh, and thence took her to the police-office of Edinburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £300." No. 138.

 Malcolm v.
 Duncan.

"(2) Whether, on or about 19th December 1896, at or near No. 10 Brown Square, Edinburgh, in the presence and hearing of pursuer's sons, Robert Malcolm and John Malcolm, or one or more of them, the defender falsely and calumniously said,—‘This is the lady’ (meaning thereby the pursuer) ‘that has caused all the trouble, and this is the boy’ (meaning thereby the said John Malcolm) ‘that stole the articles. He is the thief, and she is the resetter,’ or words to a like import and effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £100."

The pursuer had also lodged an issue for assault, but abandoned this in the Inner-House.

with a thermometer of the kind which had been stolen were suspicious. The defender therefore began the proceedings complained of in a capacity in which he was privileged.

"The pursuer, however, contended that it was so plainly illegal for the defender to take the pursuer to the police-office without first obtaining a warrant from a magistrate, that he lost the protection of his privileged position. Even upon the pursuer's own statement, I think that it is impossible to say that the defender's act was so plainly illegal that he is not to be treated as being, prima facie, a police-officer in the discharge of his duty. If it appears from the evidence that the defender was not justified in taking the pursuer to the police-office without a warrant, that will be an element for the consideration of the jury upon the question of malice.

"I am therefore of opinion that the issue upon the apprehension and taking to the police-office must be laid upon malice and want of probable cause.

"The pursuer also asks a separate issue for assault. Now, the alleged assault consisted simply in the defender's using some force to compel the pursuer to go to the police-office. It is therefore only an incident in the alleged wrongful apprehension, and although it may be material upon the question of malice, it does not, in my opinion, entitle the pursuer to a separate issue.

"The pursuer further asks an issue of slander. That matter is in a different position from those with which I have been dealing.

"The pursuer's averment is that after the defender apprehended her, and when he was taking her downstairs, he met Strachan and the pursuer's two sons, Robert and John, and that he said that the pursuer was the lady who had caused all the trouble, and that her son John was the thief, and she was the resetter. The defender, the pursuer avers, frequently repeated the accusation in a loud voice on the way to the police-office, and in the hearing not only of Strachan and her sons but of passers-by.

"Now, if that is true, as I must at this stage assume it to be, I do not think that the defender can plead privilege. No charge had been made against the pursuer by anyone, no duty lay upon the defender to announce his opinion of her criminality, and nothing was to be gained by his doing so. He would have been quite entitled to tell Strachan that he considered it to be necessary to take the pursuer to the police-office, and he might have explained to Strachan his reasons for coming to that conclusion, but according to the pursuer's averments he went very far beyond anything of that sort.

"I therefore think that the pursuer is entitled to an issue of slander in ordinary terms. Of course it will be open to the Judge before whom the case is tried to direct the jury that in this case also malice must be established, if the result of the evidence is to disclose a case of privilege."

No. 138. The defender reclaimed, and gave notice of a motion to vary the second issue by inserting the words "maliciously and without probable cause" between the words "calumniously" and "said" in the issue.

Mar. 17, 1897.
Malcolm v.
Duncan.

The pursuer also gave notice of a motion to vary the first issue, in accordance with which it would read as follows:—"Whether, on or about 19th December 1896, the defender wrongfully compelled the pursuer to go with him from her house at No. 10 Brown Square, Edinburgh, to the police-office of Edinburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £300."

Argued for the defender;—There were no averments on record warranting either an issue of wrongous apprehension, or an issue of slander. (1) As regarded the alleged wrongous apprehension, it was not, and could not well be, disputed by the pursuer that apprehensions might legally be made although without a warrant, and with respect to police-officers it might be said that in making apprehensions, even without a warrant, they were prima facie privileged—their office was their warrant. Cases might occur in which, on the pursuer's averments, the constable had so entirely gone beyond the line of his duty as prima facie to deprive him of the privilege which he ordinarily possessed. Such a case was Leask v. Burt,¹ where the arrest was made six months after the alleged offence, and there was no reason why a warrant should not have been obtained. So also in Pringle v. Bremner and Stirling,² where the constables, having a warrant to search the pursuer's house for certain articles, were alleged to have proceeded to search his repositories for other articles, and it was held that having gone beyond the warrant which they actually possessed, they had prima facie exceeded their duty, and so had committed a legal wrong. Peggie v. Clark,³ did not arise upon relevancy, but upon a concluded proof, and the Court there held that the defender was justified in arresting the pursuer, although he had no warrant to do so, and although he liberated the pursuer without bringing him before a magistrate. The pursuer here did not appear to dispute that if she had been brought before a magistrate and then liberated she could not have resisted an issue of privilege. But it was absurd to say that a police-officer lost his privilege merely because, having come to be satisfied that the arrest was groundless, he had liberated the person arrested at once, and without bringing him before a magistrate. The question therefore came to be whether, the defender being privileged, the pursuer had relevantly averred malice. A mere general averment of malice was not enough; there must be a specific averment of facts and circumstances from which, if proved, the jury might infer malice. There was no such averment here. In Young v. The Magistrates of Glasgow,⁴ where there was no question as to the constable's power to arrest without a warrant—the local Act expressly giving them that power—it was held that there was a relevant averment of malice; but the case there averred was a case of gross and persistent persecution of the pursuer—a girl—by the constables. Nothing of that sort was averred here. Then (2) as to the alleged slander, no relevant case on that ground was set forth. The slander founded on in the second issue was not a separate and distinct occurrence; it was part of the res gestæ of the apprehension, and so did not found a separate claim to damages. The Court would not permit a single legal wrong to be split up into separate issues in this way, and just as the pursuer had abandoned her issue for assault, so now the issue for slander ought also to be disallowed.¹ The pursuer had a vague averment as to repeating the alleged slander in the street. If that had been a relevant averment, a question similar to that in *Douglas v. Main*² might have arisen; but, in the first place, the averment was irrelevant for want of specification, and secondly, the pursuer did not propose to put it in issue. She put her case on slander entirely upon what the defender said on the stair of the house, in presence of the other detective-officer and the pursuer's sons, and this was simply an incident of the arrest.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) Prima facie a police-constable, or anyone else, was not privileged in apprehending a person without having a warrant from a magistrate to do so; and therefore, unless the pursuer's averments disclosed a case of privilege the Court would allow an ordinary issue, leaving the question of privilege to be determined by the facts as they came out at the trial.³ The pursuer here went further, and maintained that upon the defender's averments it was plain that he was not privileged. For he stated (ans. 8) that his "whole object in asking the pursuer to accompany him was in order that he might in the most expeditious manner ascertain the real state of matters in so far as the pursuer and her son's connection with the stolen articles was concerned." That was to say, he did not apprehend the pursuer because he had reasonable grounds for believing her to be guilty, and in order to bring her before a magistrate, or because he thought she might abscond, or put away some of the articles; he simply took her to the police-office in order that he might examine her himself with greater comfort and convenience to himself. That was entirely illegal; the purpose of apprehension was to bring the person apprehended before a magistrate.⁴ If, however, the case were held to be privileged, there was a sufficient averment of malice to warrant an issue. Whether or not the averments founded on in relation to the second issue warranted a substantive issue for slander, they were sufficient to shew malice in relation to the apprehension, and to bring the case within Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.⁵ (2) An issue for slander ought also to be granted. The defender, upon the pursuer's averments, in his language went far beyond what was necessary in making an arrest.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender in this case received information from his superiors at the police-office of a theft of certain articles, and was informed that a message had come from the pursuer's house stating that she was in possession of part of the stolen property, and he was sent to the house in the course of his duty and service as a detective-officer. At the

No. 138. house he made inquiries, and as the result of these inquiries made up his mind that the pursuer ought to be apprehended in connection with the theft. Whether she was to be charged with participation in the theft or with reset of the stolen articles was a separate question with which he had nothing to do. Now, it is said that in these circumstances he acted maliciously and without probable cause. As regards probable cause, the defender here, being a police-officer, and having instructions from his superiors, was, I think, quite entitled to arrest that person if the result of the inquiries at the house were not satisfactory, and as regards malice, unless there is something averred of a distinct kind, separate from the mere fact that he did arrest the woman, I do not think she can be entitled to an issue. Here there are averments that he was rather rough in his action in getting her to leave the house. That, of course, may happen in such cases, but there would need to be some very distinct averments beyond the mere fact of pushing the person outside her door in order to get her to go to the police-office before malice could be held to be relevantly averred. It is said that she wanted to go to the police-office alone, but that he insisted upon accompanying her. That is a matter entirely in the discretion of the officer if he thinks there is any risk of his prisoner escaping, or if he thinks that the prisoner, on the way to the police-office, may get rid of property on her person. It is entirely in his discretion whether or not he should keep his prisoner so near him as to prevent the risk of either of these things happening. There may be many cases in which a detective-officer may allow a person to go to the police-office at some distance in front of him, or even on the other side of the street. But he takes the risk, and if anything does happen, he will be reproved by his superiors for having done such a thing. But in this case, where the woman was ostensibly charged with reset of certain stolen articles, or at least being connected with articles which had been taken dishonestly, I cannot hold that it is a sufficient averment entitling the pursuer to an issue involving malice, to say that he insisted on accompanying the woman, or on her accompanying him to the police-office. I think, on the whole matter, as regards the first issue, that the pursuer has not stated a relevant case entitling her to such an issue.

The second issue is one of slander, and is to the effect that at a certain time and place, in the presence and hearing of Strachan, a brother detective, and the pursuer's two sons, the defender charged her with being a resetter. Now, Strachan was another police-officer who was engaged in inquiries into the same matter. It is quite to be expected that when the defender met his brother officer engaged upon an inquiry into the same matter as himself, he should make a statement to him regarding the person he had in custody, and that statement was made, taking the words of the issue, in an offensive form, and accusing the person of being a resetter. But that is just what a police-officer in such circumstances might do. "Here is the woman, I have got her now, and I accuse her of reset." That seems to me to be not a statement in the circumstances which can be held to have been of the nature of slander. It is said to have taken place in the hearing of the pursuer's sons Robert and John Malcolm, but these were two boys who themselves were mixed up with the affair that was being dealt with, and there is no relevant allegation that these words were said in such a way as to be heard by any other people than the police-officer and the two boys, who knew perfectly what she was being taken for. There is a vague statement on record that it was said loud enough to be heard by people in the street, but that is not a relevant statement. Had anything of that kind been distinctly averred, with names stated, it might have required consideration. But the statement made was one by a police-officer to another in the course of carrying out his duty in the detection of crime, and taking it as described in the record I am unable to hold that any relevant case for an issue of slander has been averred. I see no ground for inferring that the defender was doing anything more than as an officer making a charge in the execution of his office. There is no precedent for treating such a case as one of slander. Upon the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer has not stated a relevant case.

Duncan.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. It is certainly our duty to see that the liberty of the subject is not unlawfully invaded by the police, but in performing that duty, and considering cases which are brought before us with a view to the discharge of it, we must also be careful not to pronounce conduct on the part of the police to be an unlawful invasion of liberty which would substantially prevent the police from doing their duty in the interests of the public. In this case I think there are not allegations upon the record against the police-officer who is said to have unlawfully invaded the liberty of the subject to shew that he did so, or that he exceeded his duty to the public as a police-officer in anything he did. The policeman was sent for to the shop in Forrest Road and got the information from Mr Stevenson, the shopkeeper, upon which he, in the discharge of what he thought to be his duty, without any warrant from the magistrate, took the boy from the shop to the police-office. It is not alleged that in doing so he exceeded his duty, or unlawfully invaded the liberty of the subject, so that the pursuer may be taken to admit that the police-officers may have occasion to interfere with the liberty of the subject—boy, man, or woman—without any warrant from the magistrate, and still be pronounced to have been proceeding only in the discharge of a police-officer's duty. Now, after the information was given at the police-office upon the subject by the boy, and by the policeman reporting what he had been informed by Mr Stevenson, it was thought to be a proper police duty, in the interests of the public, to send the defender, a detective, to make inquiries upon the subject at the father's house. He went there and made inquiries, and got the information which he is said upon record to have got. The question we have to consider is, whether he unlawfully invaded the liberty of the pursuer (the boy's mother)—exceeded his duty to the public as a police-officer—in requiring her to accompany him to the police-office, and, I suppose, intimating that he would really compel her to go if she was not prepared to go without the use of force. I am of opinion that, upon the statement on record, his conduct was not in excess of his duty, but according to his duty. It would be his duty in considering the matter, with or without the aid of consultation with brother police-officers, or superior police-officers at the office, to determine whether it was reasonable and proper to detain her with the view of being brought before a magistrate next morning, if that could not be

No. 138. done sooner, or whether the proper and reasonable thing to do was to set her at liberty at once. It was conceded by counsel for the pursuer that if the police had come to the conclusion that it was proper to bring her before a magistrate next day there would be no objection to taking her from her house to the police-office without any warrant from a magistrate; but as the police came to the conclusion upon consideration that the reasonable thing to do, in her interest, and consistently with their duty to the public, was to discharge her without detention, and without taking her before the police magistrate, the pursuer's counsel said that made their conduct in taking her to the office without a warrant illegal. I cannot assent to that, and the only thing that has seriously to be considered is whether the circumstances are such that we cannot account reasonably for the officer's conduct in taking her to the office and reporting the whole facts there for consideration, and that we must attribute his conduct to improper motives and malice; or whether in taking her there he acted in such an outrageous and violent manner as to be in that respect violating his duty as a policeman. I do not think, taking the case as stated by the pursuer, that there is anything to make a case of that kind, and I am therefore of opinion that we would be interfering with the police in the proper and reasonable exercise of their police duty in the interest of the public if we were to hold that the averments here are such as to shew any violation or excess in the performance of that duty by the present defender.

Mar. 17, 1897.
Duncan.

With regard to the second issue, I agree with your Lordship that there is here no relevant averment of a charge of slander. I cannot say that I ever heard of a case of a policeman being charged with slander, and an action for slander being brought against him, for mentioning to the person himself whom he was taking to the police-office,—“I am taking you there because you are a resetter, and your little boy stole the things.” I suppose most policemen would tell a brother officer what they were taking a person to the police-office for. I asked if there were any precedent, and was informed there was none. If it had been supposed that this was slander we should before this year 1897 have had some actions against policemen for slander of the kind, and if we were to hold this case relevant we should probably have a considerable number of them in the future.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am not so clear as your Lordships on the second issue, but my doubts are not sufficient to make me dissent. On the first issue I am quite clear, and have nothing to add.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

In a competition between Robertson & Baxter and Inglis who maintained that by the law of England the indorsement and delivery of the warrant gave him a right to the whisky which was preferable to that of any creditor of Goldsmith doing diligence subsequently, held by a majority of the whole Court (diss. Lord Young) that the competition fell to be determined by the law of Scotland.

Right in Security—Pledge of documents of title—Delivery-orders—Factors Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 45), sec. 3—Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 40), sec. 1.—The Factors Act, 1889 (extended to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890), enacts, sec. 3, that "a pledge of the documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods"; and sec. 1—"For the purposes of this Act—(5) the expression 'pledge' shall include any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on goods, whether in consideration of an original advance or of any further or continuing advance or of any pecuniary liability."

Goldsmith, the owner of certain whisky in a bonded warehouse, for which he held the warrants of the warehouse-keeper, bearing that the whisky was held to the order of Goldsmith "or assigns by indorsement hereon," borrowed a sum of money from Inglis, and granted him a letter bearing that he deposited the whisky with him in security of the loan, with power of sale. At the same time he indorsed and delivered the warrants to Inglis. Thereafter Robertson & Baxter, creditors of Goldsmith, arrested the whisky in the hands of the warehouse-keeper, who had received no intimation of the indorsement and delivery of the warrants to Inglis.

In a competition for the whisky between Inglis, who founded on sec. 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, as giving him vi statuti constructive possession of the goods and a real right therein as pledgee, and Robertson & Baxter, founding on their arrestment, held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the claim of Robertson & Baxter, as arresting creditors, fell to be preferred, in respect (a) that at common law the indorsement and delivery of the warrants to Inglis, without intimation to the warehouse-keeper, left the property of the goods in Goldsmith, and so liable to the diligence of his creditors; and (b) that, assuming that sec. 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, applied to pledging by owners of goods as well as by agents, and assuming that the transaction between Goldsmith and Inglis was to be regarded as a pledging of documents of title to goods, the section did no more than confer on Inglis a personal right to have the goods delivered in pledge—diss. Lord Young, on the ground that both at common law and under the Act the indorsement and delivery of the warrants effectually transferred the whisky to Inglis in competition with any creditors of Goldsmith doing diligence thereafter.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lords Kinnear, Trayner, Kyllachy, Stormonth-Darling, and Low) that sec. 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, does not apply to pledges of documents of title to goods by the owners thereof.

In this action Robertson & Baxter obtained decree against Goldsmith for £1000, 10s. 6d., with interest and expenses.

By memorandum of agreement, dated 3d and 5th April 1895, entered into between Robertson & Baxter and Alfred Cotton Harper, chartered accountant in London, as trustee under a deed of assignment for behoof of Goldsmith's creditors, it was arranged that the whisky should be released from the arrestment upon consignment upon deposit-receipt with the British Linen Company Bank, Edinburgh, in name of Irvine, Hodges, & Borrowman, solicitors, London, and Muirhead &

Guthrie Smith, writers, Glasgow, of the sum of £1000, to be held as a surrogatum for the whisky itself, and as subject to the arrestments and claims of all parties interested in the same way as the whisky itself might have been before the agreement was entered into.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

In October 1895 Irvine, Hodges, & Borrowman, and Muirhead & Guthrie Smith, raised the present action of multiplepounding for determination of competing claims to the £1000 lodged on deposit-receipt, which was the fund in medio.

Robertson & Baxter, founding upon their arrestments and the decree in their favour, claimed the whole fund in medio.

A condescendence and claim to the whole fund in medio was also lodged for Inglis, who averred, inter alia ;—

(Cond. 1) "In the month of September 1894 Mr Walter Charles Goldsmith, of No. 40 Great Tower Street, London, wine-merchant, applied to the claimant for a loan of £3000 upon the security of certain wines and blended spirits. The claimant accepted the proposal submitted to him, and advanced the said sum in loan to the said Mr Goldsmith, from whom he received an agreement of deposit or hypothecation, dated December 18th, 1894." The substance of the above agreement was then set forth, "and at the time the said advance was made and the letter of deposit or hypothecation delivered, there were also delivered and endorsed to the claimant by Mr Goldsmith, who held the same, the warrants for the several parcels of whiskies or blended spirits which had been issued by the said bonding company. The transaction in question was entered into between the claimant and the said W. C. Goldsmith in England, both parties being domiciled in that country. The said agreement was executed in England, and the warrants endorsed and delivered in England. By the law of England the said agreement, endorsement, and delivery effected a transfer of the ownership of the whiskies to this claimant, or otherwise pledged the said goods to this claimant, so as to give him a right to said goods preferable to any arrestments subsequently used by creditors of the said W. C. Goldsmith, or otherwise transferred to this claimant a right in security preferable to any right or claim founded on the arrestments used by the said Robertson & Baxter. . . ."

Robertson & Baxter made the following answer to the foregoing averment :—(Ans. 1) "Admitted that the claimant Inglis advanced to Goldsmith the sum of £3000 on loan, and that both he and Goldsmith were domiciled in England, and this loan transaction was entered into in that country. The agreement and warrants mentioned are referred to for their terms. Admitted that the fund in medio consists of the proceeds of whisky referred to in said agreement. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the claimants Robertson & Baxter, who claim the fund in priority to this claimant, are domiciled in Scotland, and that they claim in respect of arrestments duly used by them against the said whisky according to the law of Scotland. Explained that the claimant Inglis did not get delivery, and was never in possession of the whisky referred to in the said agreement. These spirits remained in the possession of Goldsmith, and lay in his name in the custody of the Clyde Bonding Company in their stores in Glasgow, until sold on or about the month of June 1895, by arrangement under the agreement referred to in the condescendence of the fund in medio. Explained further . . . that although these 'warrants' for the spirits in question were endorsed by Goldsmith and handed to the claimant Inglis when the loan was made, the claimant Inglis gave no

No. 139. intimation thereof to the Clyde Bonding Company, and did not claim or receive delivery or possession of said goods under said warrants, nor were the same and the spirits at any time deposited with him as stated in the agreement founded on. . . . Explained that a 'warrant' is only an authority to the holder to claim and receive possession of the goods mentioned therein. The claimant Inglis neither claimed nor received possession of these goods, and failed duly to complete his title thereto."

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

Robertson & Baxter admitted that under the agreement of deposit or hypothecation founded on by Inglis there remained a balance due by Goldsmith to Inglis of £1394, 4s. 4d.*

Inglis.

Inglis pleaded;—1. The claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred primo loco to the whole fund in medio, in respect (1) the rights of parties fall to be determined by the law of England, and by said law (a) the ownership of said whiskies was transferred to this claimant by the agreement of deposit and hypothecation and the endorsement and delivery of the warrants, (b) or otherwise by said agreement, endorsement, and delivery, the whiskies were pledged or otherwise transferred in security to this claimant so as to give him a right preferable to any claim or right founded on the arrestments used by Robertson & Baxter; (2) the rights of parties fall to be determined by the law of England as lex loci contractus, in respect said agreement of deposit and hypothecation was executed and endorsement and delivery of said warrants were made in England and the parties thereto were domiciled in England; (3) by the law of Scotland the said agreement of deposit and hypothecation and the endorsement and delivery pledged or otherwise transferred the said whiskies to this claimant so as to give him a right preferable to any claim or right founded on the arrestments used by Robertson & Baxter; (4) neither of the arrestments used by Robertson & Baxter attached or covered any right or property in the said whiskies belonging to the said W. C. Goldsmith. 2. This claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim in respect of the transactions condescended on in condescendence 1, and of section 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, and section 1 of the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890.

On 20th March 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the claim for Robert William Inglis: Sustains the claim for Robertson & Baxter, and ranks and prefers them to the whole fund in medio in terms thereof: Further approves of the condescendence of the fund in medio, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to the expenses of," &c.*

Section 25 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, enacts as follows,—“In this section the term ‘mercantile agent’ has the same meaning as in the Factors Acts.” Section 62 of the same Act adopted the definition of “document of title” given in section 1 (4) of the Factors Act, 1889.

The Factors Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 39), sec. 4, enacted as follows,—“And be it enacted that any bill of lading, India warrant, dock warrant, warehouse-keepers’ certificate, warrant, or order for the delivery of goods, or any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise either by indorsement or by delivery the possessor of such document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented, shall be deemed and taken to be a document of title within the meaning of this Act, and any agent intrusted as aforesaid and possessed of any such document of title, whether derived immediately from the owner of such goods or obtained by reason of such agent’s having been intrusted with the possession of the goods, or of any other document of title thereto, shall be deemed and taken to have been intrusted with the possession of the goods represented by such document of title as aforesaid; and all contracts pledging or giving a lien upon such document of title as aforesaid shall be deemed and taken to be respectively pledges of and liens upon the goods to which the same relates, and such agent shall be deemed to be possessed of such goods or documents whether the same shall be in his actual custody or shall be held by any other person subject to his control, or for him or on his behalf. . . .”

After a hearing the Second Division, on 8th July, pronounced an interlocutor appointing the parties to prepare and box "mutual minutes of debate, in order to the opinion of the whole Judges being obtained on the question raised by the record."

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

In his minute of debate the claimant and reclamer Inglis argued;—I. This claimant was entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, because the rights of parties fell to be determined by the law of England, in respect that the agreement of deposit or hypothecation was executed, and endorsement and delivery of warrants were made, in England, and the parties thereto were domiciled and resident in England. It was indisputable that by the law of England the agreement and the endorsement and delivery to the present in Glasgow, and belonged to one Mr Goldsmith, a merchant in London. The competing claimants are two creditors of Mr Goldsmith, viz., Messrs Robertson & Baxter and Mr Robert William Inglis. The former claim a preference in virtue of an arrestment of the whisky used in the hands of the warehouse-keeper on the dependence of an action in which they (Messrs Robertson & Baxter) have now obtained decree. The latter claims in virtue of a transaction prior in date to the arrestment, by which transaction he obtained delivery, blank indorsed, of the warehouse-keeper's certificates, which Mr Goldsmith held for the whisky.

"It is not suggested that prior to the arrestment any intimation of this transaction had been made to the warehouse-keeper. If it had been, there could, I suppose, have been no doubt as to Mr Inglis' preference. But, as matters stand, that gentleman's case seems to depend on his shewing that the property of the whisky was transferred to him, or at all events a valid pledge constituted in his favour, by the mere indorsation and delivery of the warehouse-keeper's certificate. The question accordingly is, whether that is a proposition which can be made good in law.

"Now, there can, I think, be no doubt that this is a question which must be determined according to the law of Scotland—the law of the country where the goods in dispute were situated. Neither can it, I think, be doubted that, according to the common law of Scotland, the mere indorsation of a warehouse-keeper's certificate operates nothing by way of transfer either of property or possession. Until followed by intimation, it confers only a personal right, and cannot compete with the nexus created by a valid arrestment. These are propositions which perhaps hardly require authority, but reference may be made to the case of Connal & Co. v. Loder, 6 Macph. 1095, where the law on both points is explained at length.

"The suggestion, however, is made that all this has been altered by recent statute, and that, as the law now stands, warehouse-keepers' certificates, dock warrants, and such other documents of title are, for the purposes of the present question, now in the same category with bills of lading. I must say that this strikes one as rather a startling proposition, but the statutes appealed to are—(1) The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sections 25 and 47; (2) The Factors Act of 1889, sections 9 and 3; (3) The Factors Act of 1890, extending the last-mentioned Act to Scotland.

"The Sale of Goods Act of 1893 no doubt introduces this innovation into the law of Scotland, that in the case of a sale the property of goods now passes without delivery. Accordingly, if the transaction between Mr Goldsmith and Mr Inglis had been a sale, the latter must, I suppose, have prevailed against any subsequently arresting creditor. But the transaction was not a sale, but a loan on security, the security being sought to be constituted by a contract of hypothecation of this parcel of whisky. There is nothing, therefore, which can help the pursuer in the change which has been made

No. 139. claimant of the warrants formed an effectual transfer of the whiskies to him in security of the advances made by him in respect of whiskies. It was submitted that this case was on the same footing, and was to be ruled by the same law, as it would be if Goldsmith had transferred in England to Inglis a right to a debt which was localised in Scotland, and Robertson & Baxter had thereafter arrested the debt in Scotland. The law of England would, on the authorities, undoubtedly have to be given effect to by the Scots Courts in a competition in regard to such a transaction—Mobilia situm non habent and Mobilia sequuntur personam.¹ It was admitted in the present case that the whisky belonged to Goldsmith. Any transfer of it by him must therefore be ruled by the law of the place where the transfer was made, viz., by the law of England. A sequestration of his property in England, or bankruptcy proceedings there prior in date to an arrestment of part of it in Scotland, would have been looked at in proceedings in the Scots Courts on the Scotch law of sale. And with respect to the enactments of the 25th and 47th sections of the Act referred to, and the 9th and following sections of the Factors Act of 1889, all that I need say is, that I have not been able to understand how they have any bearing on the case. They relate not at all to the completion of the right of the purchaser or transferee of goods, but to a quite different matter, viz., the rights as against the owners of goods which may be obtained under transactions with persons who, although not the true owners, are either apparent owners, or have apparent authority to represent the true owners.

"The argument for Mr Inglis was, however, mainly rested on the 3d section of the Factors Act of 1889, which provides as follows:—'A pledge of the documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods.' It is said that literally this covers the case, and that, whether intended or not, the enactment now applies to Scotland.

"It must be admitted that, in a statute which applied, or was intended to be applied, to Scotland, the language of this section is open to misconstruction. In England it is, I believe, the law that a security (known as an equitable mortgage) may be constituted by deposit or pledge of any document of title—even a policy of insurance or a share certificate. But in Scotland the law is different, and if the enactment in question had occurred in a statute which dealt generally with the constitution of securities, the result would have been certainly a notable innovation in Scotch law. As it is, however, the difficulty is more apparent than real.

"In the first place, this 3d section of the Factors Act of 1889 is merely a repetition of a clause which occurs in the 4th section of the Factors Act of 1842, an Act which always applied to Scotland, but as to which it has never, so far as I know, been suggested that it operated any change in the Scotch law as to the completion of securities depending upon possession. Otherwise the case of Connal & Co. v. Loder could not have been

Baxter v.
Inglis.

In answer to the arguments advanced by the respondents for the proposition that the question between the parties could only be determined by the lex situs, it was submitted that the passage quoted from Bell's Comm., 5th edition, ii., pp. 18 and 19, referred to assignations. The transaction between Goldsmith and the reclaimer was more than an assignation. Goldsmith was actually in possession as owner of the parcel of whisky, and he, by the agreement of deposit or hypothecation, actually deposited and pledged the parcel of whisky to the reclaimer. The transfer of possession and ownership to Goldsmith by the respondents was admitted by the respondents. By the endorsement of the delivery warrants, and delivery of these warrants by Goldsmith to the reclaimer, and the agreement of deposit or hypothecation, the parcel of whisky was constructively delivered to the reclaimer. It was not a case of a debt being assigned, or of corporeal moveables being assigned, but one of corporeal moveables being constructively delivered. But assuming that the transfer of ownership of corporeal moveables situated in Scotland was, according to Scots law, on the same footing as a transfer of the jus exigendi of a debt due in Scotland, it was submitted that such debts might be conveyed otherwise than by assignation, and so might corporeal moveables, no intimation at all being required. In support of this contention reference was made to the passage in Bell's decided as it was. That, however, is perhaps merely an observation. The conclusive consideration is that the enactment in question must be read in connection with its context, and with reference to the object of the Act in which it occurs. Now, that Act is one which relates exclusively to the powers of factors or mercantile agents, and its sole object is to give validity to securities granted by such factors or agents over the property of their principals, with respect to which property they have ostensibly full powers of disposal. In this view, all that is meant by the enactment now in question is that, for the purposes of the Act—that is to say, as between factor and principal—a pledge by a factor of documents of title to goods shall be as effectual as a pledge of the goods themselves. In other words, the factor's pledge, whether of the goods or of the documents, shall have the same effect as if made by the principal. Now, this obviously does not touch the question as to the requirements of an effectual pledge in a question with arresting creditors or other third parties. That is left, as before, to the common law.

"It might perhaps be added that in this case the transaction with Mr Inglis was not (at least according to Scotch law) a pledge at all. The warehouse-keeper's certificate was indorsed—not merely delivered. There is, therefore, a transfer of title, not merely a transfer of possession, and that distinction is material (Hamilton v. Western Bank, 19 D. 152). It is not, however, necessary to pursue that matter. On the whole, I think the case is a clear one, and I am of opinion that Mr Inglis' claim must be repelled, and Messrs Robertson & Baxter ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, in terms of their claim."

No. 139. Comm., 5th edition, ii., immediately succeeding that relied on by the respondents, where it was stated that "debts may be conveyed otherwise than by assignation (as by drafts or by indorsation of bills, or by the debtor giving a new document of debt payable to the assignee) . . . the document of debt itself may be transmitted by indorsation, to the effect of enabling the indorsee to make a valid claim in bankruptcy, or to follow forth a new course of diligence." Now, it was contended by the reclaimer that, on this view of the law, the documents of title to the whisky, having been not only transmitted by endorsation, but also delivered along with the agreement of deposit or hypothecation to the reclaimer by Goldsmith (Goldsmith having had these documents of title in his possession in respect of the order given by the respondents to the Clyde Bonding Company), were on the same footing in law as a new document of debt, given by the debtor payable to the assignee; and that the reclaimer was in the position of an assignee who had received from the debtor a new document of debt payable to the assignee.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

The case of *Gray*¹ referred to by the respondents might be discarded, as it was apparent from the note to Bell's Comm., p. 18, that there was a difficulty in determining what that case decided. Carrick v. Dickie's Assignees,² quoted by the respondents, was over-ruled by Goetze v. Aders,³ and *Strachan v. M'Dougle*⁴ and Donaldson v. Ord,⁵ also cited by the respondents, were over-ruled by Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen.⁶ Connal & Company v. Loder,⁷ relied on by the respondents, did not apply, and was not an authority for the necessity of intimation of the transaction between Goldsmith and the reclaimer. Even if it were such authority, and if intimation, or "something equivalent to intimation," to quote from the passage cited by the respondents from Bell's Comm. ii. by the respondents, had been necessary, "something equivalent" to intimation had taken place. For it was by order of the respondents that the warrants for delivery of the goods were issued by the Clyde Bonding Company to Goldsmith. The respondents thus clearly shewed that they intended to divest themselves of all property in the parcel of whisky, and therefore never could have expected that subsequent transaction with reference to the goods should either have to be intimated to them or to the Clyde Bonding Company. The presentation to the Clyde Bonding Company by the holder of the warrants for the whisky when delivery of it was required was the only intimation necessary that the goods had changed hands. This contention was borne out by the terms of the delivery-order, which prescribed simple endorsement of the order. Reference was also made to Lee v. Abdy.⁸

It was therefore submitted that the conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary had come, "that this is a question which must be determined according to the law of Scotland," was erroneous, if by that it was meant that the rights of parties under the law of England were to be disregarded. No. 139.

On the contrary, the present claimant contended—(1) That he was entitled to be ranked and preferred primo loco to the whole fund in medio, in respect that the agreement of deposit and hypothecation, and the endorsement and delivery of the warrants, pledged or otherwise transferred the whiskies to him, so as to give him a right preferable to any claim or right founded on the arrestments subsequently used by Robertson & Baxter; and (2) that he was entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim, in respect of the transactions condescended on, and of section 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, and section 1 of the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890. Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

It would be convenient to discuss these two pleas together.

The agreement entered into between Goldsmith and the present claimant Inglis was not only an agreement of deposit or hypothecation of the whisky, or of pledge of the whisky, but it also gave Inglis full power to sell it without further consent from Goldsmith, in the event of Goldsmith failing to repay the advance of £3000, with interest, to Inglis. It was more than an agreement of pledge. The warrants for delivery of the whisky were at the same time endorsed and delivered by Goldsmith to Inglis. This endorsement and delivery of the warrants, coupled with the agreement, constituted a pledge of the documents of title to the whisky, and also gave Inglis a power to sell the whisky in the event of his advance to Goldsmith not being repaid. It was to be kept in view that, as above stated, it was admitted by Robertson & Baxter that the property in the goods had been transferred to Goldsmith. The goods, they admitted, had been delivered to him. It therefore followed that Goldsmith could transfer the property by sale or otherwise to a third party, viz., Inglis, and the right of this third party must have prevailed against any subsequently arresting creditor. This proposition was affirmed by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion.

The law of Scotland, as affecting the question at issue in this case, was the same as the law of England, and was to be found in the Factors Act, 1889, which was made to apply to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, section 1. The Lord Ordinary's view that the Factors Act, 1889, related exclusively to the powers of factors or mercantile agents was erroneous. Reference was made to sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Act, which formed a department of the Act, entitled "dispositions by sellers and buyers of goods." It was submitted that, under section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, and of section 25 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which were in the same terms, Goldsmith was in the position of a person who, "having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to goods." That was admitted by Robertson & Baxter. They also admitted that Goldsmith did deliver or transfer the delivery-orders or warrants to a third party, the present claimant Inglis, and Inglis received "the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods." This was not denied by Robertson & Baxter, and it was borne out by the statement in the agreement, that Goldsmith had full power and authority to transfer the goods, and hence also the documents of title to the goods. Now, it was submitted that the delivery-orders or warrants which Goldsmith endorsed and delivered over to

No. 139. Inglis came within the definition of "document of title" given in section 1 (4) of the Factors Act, 1889, which was adopted as the definition of the term in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, section 62. By these delivery-orders or warrants the Clyde Bonding Company held the whisky "to the order of Walter C. Goldsmith or assigns by endorsement." This was an acknowledgment that the Bonding Company held the whisky for Goldsmith, and subject to his control, and a proof of Goldsmith's possession of the whisky, and it prescribed the mode in which that possession and control should be transferred. In the words of the definition in section 1 of the Factors Act, 1889, it was a "document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise, either by indorsement or by delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented." The warrants or delivery-orders being documents of title, were, in terms of section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, delivered or transferred, and their delivery or transfer passed the property of the goods to Inglis; they were delivered or transferred under a "pledge or other disposition thereof," or under an "agreement for . . . pledge or other disposition thereof." The agreement was more than one of pledge—it gave a power of sale. No intimation of it was required to anyone. Section 9 prescribed the effect of such delivery or transfer. It "shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner," in the sense of section 1 (1) (2) and (3), and section 2 (1). Goldsmith delivered or transferred, in terms of section 9, the documents of title to the goods, under a pledge of or an agreement to pledge the goods, within the meaning of section 1 (5), or under a pledge of the documents of title, and this, under section 3, operated as an effectual and complete pledge of the goods.¹

In answer to the respondents' argument upon the Factors Acts, the reclaimer submitted the following view of these Acts, and Sale of Goods Act of 1893, so far as applicable to the present case :—

The Factors Acts of 1823, 1825, and 1842, related exclusively to the powers of factors or other mercantile agents intrusted with possession of goods or documents of title to goods. It was only in the case of *Vickers v. Hertz*² that it was ascertained that the Factors Acts applied to Scotland. But it was settled by decisions in England that "agent" did not include "vendee," and that a vendee could not give as good a title as an agent.³ This anomaly was removed by the 4th section of the Factors Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 39), which dealt with the case, not of agents, but of buyers or sellers left in possession of the documents of title to goods. Section 8 of the Factors Act, 1889 (seller remaining in possession), was substituted for section 3 of the Factors Act, 1877, and was now reproduced in section 25 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Section 9 of the Factors Act, 1889 (buyer obtaining possession), was substituted for section 4 of the Factors Act, No. 139. 1877, and was now reproduced in section 25 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The Factors Act of 1877 only applied to documents of title, but sections 8 and 9 of the Factors Act of 1889 applied to goods as well as to documents of title. Section 25 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, created in effect a statutory reputed ownership where, notwithstanding delivery, the passing of the property was suspended. Section 61 (4) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, excluded pledge from the scope of the Act; but an exception to this exclusion was made by sections 25 and 47. It was therefore clear that the question now submitted could not have arisen under the Factors Act of 1842, or any of the prior Acts, but that the enactments upon which it was raised occurred only in the recent statutes mentioned.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

It was submitted, on the whole matter, that the right in the claimant Inglis, constituted as above stated, being prior in date to the arrestment used by the claimants Robertson & Baxter, should be given effect to by the Court by ranking and preferring him to the whole fund in medio, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be reversed.

In their minute of debate, Robertson & Baxter argued;—There could be no doubt that according to the common law of Scotland the agreement of deposit and the endorsement and delivery of the delivery-orders without intimation were ineffectual in competition with the respondents' arrestment and decree. But the reclaimer pleaded (1) that the rights of parties fell to be determined by the law of England, and had made certain averments with regard to that law of which he asked probation; and (2) that, assuming the law of Scotland to be applicable, the rule of the common law had been altered by section 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, and section 1 of the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, and that by virtue of these enactments he was entitled to the preference claimed.

I. The averment which the reclaimer made with reference to the law of England was irrelevant on account of its vagueness. It stated as the law of England three alternative propositions (1) that the agreement and endorsement effected a transfer of ownership; (2) that they effected a pledge preferable to subsequent arresting creditors; or (3) that they constituted a right in security preferable to the respondents. The first of these propositions was contradicted by the terms of the agreement itself, besides being inconsistent with the second and third, and the latter were not statements of any legal proposition but of the result which would follow from the application of the law of England, which was not stated, to the particular case. An averment of foreign law in order to be remitted to probation must be clear and precise. It was to be ascertained as a fact, and the party relying on it ought to be in a position to state it distinctly, and was bound to do so. If he failed to do so, not only did he fail to give sufficient notice to the other party of the law on which he founded, but he failed to put the Court in a position to judge of the admissibility of the evidence. If, for example, the third alternative stated by the reclaimer were examined, it was apparent that it did not state the law on which he founded, and that the result stated might conceivably be arrived at on various grounds which, if stated, would not be admitted to probation. For example, it might be arrived at on the view that a pledge made in England was preferable to any diligence used in Scot-

No. 139. land, whether prior or subsequent, or on the view that a decree and diligence proceeding upon an arrestment to found jurisdiction against an Englishman could not compete with a security granted in England. Such averments, if made, would be irrelevant as in direct contradiction to the principles upon which Scots law was governed. But the reclaimer in his third alternative did not give the Court the opportunity of judging upon what propositions he relied. To remit this averment to probation would be to refer the whole case to the determination of English counsel or of the English Court, a course which was plainly inadmissible.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

But, assuming that the reclaimer's averment was not open to this objection, the respondents contended that the rights of parties in this competition must be determined by the law of Scotland, and that any averment that, by the law of England, the right of the reclaimer to the whisky in question was complete, without the necessity of intimation or of actual or constructive delivery, was irrelevant. Where, as here, a question arose as to the competing rights of security holders or creditors doing diligence with reference to corporeal moveables situated in Scotland, the competition ought to be determined by the law of Scotland as the lex situs of the goods and the lex fori of the competition. The question depended upon whether or not a real right had been completed in the person of the creditor, and that question could not be determined except by the law of the place where the res was situated, and where the preference was claimed. It might be true that where a contract was made in England with reference to moveables in Scotland, the rights of the parties to the contract would fall to be determined by the law of England as the lex loci contractus, but where the party having right under the contract sought to vindicate his right in and to the thing itself against third parties, then the question depended not upon his contract, which affected only the contracting parties, but upon whether or not he had obtained a real right in the thing itself which he could vindicate against all the world. This question could be determined only by the lex situs. The personal rights of the various competing parties might depend upon contracts made or transactions taking place in different countries, and according to different laws, but when these parties sought to vindicate their rights in the subject, and to determine their preferences, they must appeal to the law of the country in which the subject was situated to determine which of them was, or in what order of priority they were, in fact vested with real rights in the subjects; and the law of that country, when so appealed to, could give answer only according to the rules and principles which it recognised and administered within its borders. Accordingly, where a competition arose between different parties as to the priority of their securities over corporeal moveables situated in Scotland, the question must be determined according to the law of Scotland, and where delivery, actual or constructive, was necessary, according to the law of Scotland, to complete the real right, the claimant who could not qualify such delivery must give way to the claimant whose right was complete.

The law of Scotland was settled to this effect by decision, and was in accordance with the opinions of the more numerous and weighty authorities upon private international law. The authorities about to be cited referred in some cases to competitions with reference to the right to debts due in Scotland, but as these had always been dealt with on the footing that they had a local situation in Scotland just as corporeal moveables which were actually situated there, their applicability was obvious. In Bell's Comm. 5th edition, ii. 18, 19, the law was thus stated:—"An assignation made in England requires not the ceremony of intimation to complete the transfer of a debt due there. But such an assignation of a debt due in Scotland produced in a competition with creditors arresting the fund will be ineffectual without intimation or something equivalent"; and in a note it is explained that the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of *Sir J. Gray*¹ proceeded on the view that there had been intimation. In Carrick v. Dickie's Assignees,² it was held that an assignation made in England by one English merchant to another, of certain consignments of goods made by the cedent to a Glasgow firm carrying on business in Jamaica, but not intimated, was invalid in competition with the cedent's assignees in bankruptcy, the goods, as in the custody of the Glasgow firm and under their control, being viewed as locally situated in Scotland. In *Strachan v. M'Dougle*³ an arrestment was held preferable to an unintimated assignation of a policy of life assurance, although the policy had been delivered along with a letter of assignation to the assignee in England. In *Donaldson v. Ord*⁴ the question arose in a competition between a lady, who had arrested funds in Scotland belonging to her debtor, and persons claiming that these funds had been assigned to them by an English creditor deed prior to the arrestment. It was held that the competition must be determined according to the law of Scotland, and that, as the facts and circumstances proved did not come up to intimation, the arrestments must prevail.

In *Connal & Co. v. Loder*⁵ the following propositions, as stated in the rubric, were decided, viz.:—" (1) That the iron being locally situated in Scotland, the question whether the right to the iron was carried by indorsation of the warrants, or by indorsation and intimation, fell to be determined by the law of Scotland; (2) that the right to the iron was not completed by indorsation alone; (3) that the right was completed by indorsation and intimation." In that case Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis dealt by way of illustration and argument with the precise question which was raised in the present case, his opinion being in favour of the respondents' contention. The only opinion, so far as the respondents were aware, which conflicted with these authorities was the opinion of Lord Rutherford in the case of Wallace v. Davies.⁶ In the Inner-House it was held that intimation had been made, and no opinion was expressed on the question discussed by Lord Rutherford. The case was prior to Donaldson v. Ord,⁴ and was cited in that case, and referred to by the Lord Justice-Clerk in his opinion; the decision in *Donaldson v. Ord*⁴ must be held to overrule the opinion of Lord Rutherford, with which it was inconsistent.

The Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen,⁷ cited by the reclainer, decided no more than this—that, as by the law of England, where the

No. 139. transaction took place, the personal right was complete, intimation following upon it was sufficient to complete the security according to the law of Scotland. It was plain that if no intimation had been proved the decision would have been the other way. In the North-Western Bank, Limited, v. Poynter, Son, & Macdonald,¹ also cited by the reclaimer, no question of conflict arose between the laws of England and Scotland, but opinions were expressed by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson that had there been such conflict the question would have fallen to be determined by the law of England. What the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson said was that the transactions having taken place in England, their meaning and effect ought in conflict to be determined by the law of England. But this did not touch the question here. There was no question in that case of the completion of the right to the debt in Scotland. The right of one or other of the parties was complete and indubitable. The only question was which party had the right. The reclaimer also relied upon the undernoted cases.² They were all cases as to the effect to be allowed to a foreign sequestration or commission of bankruptcy. The rule applied in such cases, both in England and Scotland, was that, where sequestration or its equivalent had been awarded by the Court of the debtor's domicile, no second sequestration would be awarded. The principle upon which the rule was founded was that bankruptcy was, in its nature, of universal application. There could be no partial sequestration. Accordingly a principle must be found which would determine in a case of conflict which Court had the power of effecting such a compulsory transfer of the universitas of the bankrupt's estate, and the principle adopted here and in England was that the appropriate forum was the forum of the debtor's domicile. The law of his domicile was that which regulated his succession, his personal rights, status, &c., and it appropriately followed that the Courts of that forum had a right to divest him of the universitas of his estate, and that all his creditors ought to resort there as the proper forum concursus. The rule was special to the case of bankruptcy, and was dictated by the expediency of recognising one forum concursus, and the propriety of recognising the most convenient.³ To apply the law of the domicile to the ordinary transfer of moveables would involve an inquiry in every case into the domicile of the transferor before the validity of a transfer could be affirmed, and would lead to anomalous results. It would follow, for example, that a domiciled Englishman resident in Scotland could give a bill of sale over his furniture in Scotland, while a domiciled Scotsman resident in London could not give a bill of sale over his furniture there. The respondents also referred to the undernoted authorities.⁴

their arrestments and decree was founded upon section 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, and section 1 of the Factors Act, 1890. The Act in which the section founded on occurred was an Act which repealed all the previous Factors Acts, and the purpose of which was to consolidate the law upon the subjects dealt with in those Acts in one Act. The subject-matter of the Act might be generally stated to be the presumed powers of factors or mercantile agents or others put in possession of goods or documents of title by the true owners, to deal with such goods or documents of title, and the object of the Act was to render such transactions valid in certain cases in a question with the true owner. The division of the Act in which the section relied on occurred was headed "Dispositions by Mercantile Agents." The first section under this heading, viz., sec. 2, defined (subsec. 1) the powers of mercantile agents in possession of goods or the documents of title to goods, and provided (subsec. 2) that these powers should continue, notwithstanding the determination of the owner's consent to the agent's possession, (subsec. 3) that possession presumed consent, and (subsec. 4) that this was to be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Then followed the section founded on. Now it was to be observed that these sections were substantially re-enactments of the provisions of the repealed Factors Acts. In particular, sec. 2, subsec. 3, and sec. 3 (the clause founded on) were substantially a re-enactment of sec. 4 of the Factors Act, 1842, the words of sec. 3 being copied from it almost verbatim. That the Act of 1842 was applicable to Scotland was settled by Vickers v. Hertz.¹ If the reclaimer's contention therefore be sound it followed that the common law of Scotland, which required intimation in order to complete the transference of goods held under a delivery-order, had been abrogated by a statute which purported to deal, not with the completion of real rights in moveables, but only with the powers of mercantile agents in dealing with the property of their principals. The result was sufficiently startling, but it was rendered all the more so if it was considered that in the reclaimer's view this had been the law of Scotland since 1842. Many cases had arisen since then in which it would have been in the interests of one of the parties to have put forward such a contention, but there was no record of any attempt having been made to found on the Factors Acts in similar competitions. Nor, so far as the respondents were aware, had it ever been suggested in any case in England, to which the Factors Acts also applied, that this clause had any such effect as the reclaimer contended for.² Such a reading of the statutes of 1842 and 1889 was not admissible; the words relied on by the reclaimer must be read in connection with the statutes in which they occurred; their meaning was that for the purposes of the Act,—that was to say, in questions between the principal and persons acquiring right from a factor, or person entrusted with documents of title,—a pledge of the documents of title should be deemed to be a pledge of the goods. The enactment, so read, consisted with the scope of the statutes in

Inglist.

Further, the transaction in question was neither a pledge of documents of title nor a pledge of goods. That it was not a pledge of documents of title was clear from the terms of the agreement, which bore that the transaction was a deposit of the goods themselves. Further, according to the law of Scotland, the endorsement and delivery of the order to the reclaimer, even if intimated, did not constitute a pledge, but a transference of the proprietary right to the goods, available not only for the specific advance for which the transfer was made but for all other advances.¹ Accordingly, if the language of the section was to be read literally, and regarded as of universal application, its scope was restricted to contracts of pledge, and so did not cover the transaction in question.

The reclaimer founded an argument upon section 9 and section 2 (1) of the Factors Act, 1889. It was difficult to understand the application of these sections to the present case. Goldsmith was the owner, and it was hard to see how his title to transfer could be strengthened by enactments which would make him in certain circumstances as good as an owner. The question was not as to Goldsmith's power to deal with the goods. He had ample power—the power of an owner. The question was whether he validly exercised his power and effectually transferred the goods. The reclaimer had wholly mistaken the effect of the Factors Acts upon the negotiability of documents of title. At common law such documents lacked the two essentials of negotiability (with the exception of bills of lading, which lacked only the first), viz. (1) possession of them was not conclusive of the title to transfer; and (2) the property they represented was not transferable by their mere delivery or indorsation without intimation. With reference to the former of these requisites, the Factors Acts introduced a change, and in certain defined cases the possession of the document was declared to be conclusive of the title to transfer. With reference to the second, the modus transferendi, no change was made, with one exception—that contained in section 10 of the Act of 1889. Had the Factors Acts had the effect for which the reclaimer contended, of rendering documents of title in all respects equivalent to bills of lading, the special provision of section 10 would have been unnecessary. Its insertion shewed that in other respects the law as to the transfer of goods held upon documents of title was unchanged. The opinions of Lord Young and Lord Wellwood, Ordinary, in Browne & Co. v. Ainslie,² were obiter, and were not concurred in by the other Judges.

The respondents submitted that they were entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

The consulted Judges returned the following opinions:—

LORD PRESIDENT and LORD ADAM.—We concur in Lord M'Laren's opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—My first impression after considering the arguments was that unless the 3d section of the Factors Act, 1889, were limited in its application to the case of pledges by "mercantile agents," and did not apply to the contracts of principals, the title of the indorsee of the delivery-order would be preferable to that of the arresting creditor.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglist.

On further consideration I have come to be of opinion that the decision of the case does not depend on whether the 3d section applies to pledges by principals. I think that the language of the enactment is so general that it may be taken to include the case of a pledge by a principal, but then I think that when so applied it makes no change in the law of title. The turning point of the case, in my view, is the meaning of the word "pledge" as used in the 3d section.

But for the interpretation of the word "pledge" contained in the 1st section it would be very difficult to attach any meaning to the 3d section.

Pledge in our law is a real security over moveables constituted by delivery of the goods to the pledgee or his order, to the effect that he may detain the goods until paid. It is plain that there can be no pledge of a document of title in this sense, because this would only mean a real security over the piece of paper. But according to the 1st section the word "pledge" is to include "any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on goods."

Reading this definition into the 3d section, the result is that a contract giving a lien or security on goods may be made by a holder of documents of title, and also that an actual pledge or real right in security may be made by a holder of documents of title. It is not explained what is to be done with the documents of title in order to constitute such contract right or real right, as the case may be. I therefore assume that this is left to the operation of the general law of contracts and rights in security, under which a transfer of the document of title gives a contract right effectual against the grantor and any principal whom he may represent, while intimation to the warehouse-keeper is necessary to the constitution of a real right.

All that we know of the history of the development of this branch of the law is consistent with the proposed construction: in particular the case of M'Ewan v. Smith,¹ which stamped the doctrine I refer to with the approval of the House of Lords, was decided seven years after the passing of the Factors Act of 1842. Now, the Factors Act of 1842 contains an enactment equivalent to the 3d section of the Act of 1889, and, if the meaning of the enactment was that a right in security might be constituted by the mere transfer of a document of title without intimation to the warehouse-keeper, then the judgment in *M'Ewan v. Smith*¹ was wrong. But I must hold that judgment to be good law, and I attach little weight to the circumstance that the Factors Act of 1842 is not considered in the judgment, because this only proves that in their Lordships' view the Factors Act had no effect in altering the mode of acquisition of a real right.

I do not enter upon the other points in the case, because they have been treated by other members of the Court in entire accordance with my opinion. I think that Mr Inglis only acquired a contract right to the whisky under the agreement of 18th June 1894 and the relative indorsed but unin-

I assume that this is a good contract right by the law of England; and then applying the law of Scotland to the case of competition of real rights, my opinion is that the right of Robertson & Baxter, the arresting creditors, being followed by intimation, is preferable to the right of Inglis.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

1. I think the question in dispute must be determined by the law of Scotland. The validity and effect of an arrestment of goods in Glasgow cannot be determined by any other law, and the competing claimant, who alleges a right preferable to that of the arrester, relies upon an Act of Parliament which has been made applicable to Scotland, and which we are bound to construe in the same way as if it had been intended to apply to Scotland from the first. But he founds upon the indorsement of a warrant issued by the warehouse-keeper in Glasgow, and he maintains that, as the agreement under which the warrant was indorsed and delivered to him was executed in England between two domiciled Englishmen, the question between him and the arresting creditor must be treated as one of English law. I agree that the law of England must regulate the effect of the English agreement, as between the parties to that agreement. But the question is not whether the claimant Inglis has acquired a good right against the owner of the goods, but whether his right, assuming it to be effectual against the party with whom he contracted, has been so completed as to put the Glasgow warehouse-keeper in the position of holding no longer for the owner of the goods deposited in his store, but for his transferee. I find no averment on record that the mere indorsement and delivery of a warehouse-keeper's certificate, without notice to the warehouse-keeper, has this effect by the law of England; but if it were so averred it would not, in my opinion, be relevant to the question. In so far as it is a question of contract, it depends upon a contract made and to be performed in Scotland. There is no new contract between the warehouse-keeper and the indorsee of the certificate. The latter is substituted for the indorser, but the warehouse-keeper remains under the original contract which he made in Scotland, when he issued the certificate by which he undertakes to hold for the owner or his assigns. If the transferee, therefore, had brought a direct action in this Court against the warehouse-keeper for delivery of the goods, I cannot see any ground on which the law of Scotland could have been displaced. The lex loci contractus, the lex loci solutionis, the lex domicilii of the debtor, and the lex fori would have been the same; and the circumstance that the pursuer had acquired right by an English transaction would not have excluded the law of the place where the contract upon which he sued was made, where it was to be performed, and where the action was brought—Robertson v. Burdekin.¹ But if this were doubtful, it would still be clear, in my opinion, that in a case which resolves into a competition of diligence, the real right in the goods in dispute must be determined by the law of the place where the goods are situated, and where the remedy is sought—Donaldson v. Ord.²

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglist.

Goods belonging to an Englishman were lying in a warehouse in Scotland. The owner holding the warehouse-keeper's certificate made a contract of hypothecation, whereby he declared that he delivered the goods to a lender in pledge for an advance. At the same time he indorsed the warehouseman's certificate to the lender; but the contract made no reference to the certificate or its indorsement. The lender gave no intimation to the warehouse-keeper, and a creditor of the borrower arrested the goods in the warehouse-keeper's hands. There can be no doubt that, independently of the Factors Act, the arrestment excludes the lender, because the warehouseman, having no notice of any transference of the owner's right, was still holding for him, and not for his transferee, when the arrestment was effected. But it is said that the law of Scotland has been altered by the Factors Acts, so that warehouse-keepers' certificates, and similar documents of title, must now have all the effect of bills of lading, and a pledge of the document is for all purposes equivalent in law to a pledge of the goods.

So far as this depends on the Act of 1842 the argument seems to me very clearly untenable. The enactment in that statute that "all contracts pledging or giving a lien on documents of title shall be deemed and taken to be respectively pledges of and liens upon the goods to which the same relate," forms part of a clause which deals exclusively with contracts made by agents intrusted with documents of title which are used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, and its purpose is to validate contracts of such agents as binding upon the true owners of the goods. That it was not intended to alter the general law is sufficiently established by the decision in M'Ewan v. Smith,¹ where it was held, some years after the passing of the statute, that a delivery-note to the order of the vendee is not tantamount to a bill of lading, and will not transfer a right of property to the transferee. Again, in the case of Cole v. The North Western Bank,² where the effect of the Factors Act of 1842 was very elaborately discussed, its effect is thus stated by Lord Bramwell:—"Speaking generally, the statute was meant to apply to those cases where one person has given an apparent authority to another, and a third person has dealt with that other in the belief that the authority really existed." I cannot think it doubtful that the clause relied on applies to such cases only, and has no relation to transactions in which the true owner is himself the granter of the security.

It may be a more difficult question whether the third section of the Act of 1889 may not have a wider application. It appears to me, however, that, occurring as it does in an Act to amend and consolidate the previous Factors Acts, it merely reproduces the provisions of the Act of 1842, and that its only effect, like that of the corresponding provision in the earlier Act, is that, as against the owner of the goods, a pledge by an agent intrusted with documents of title is as effectual when made by pledging the document as it is when made by pledging the goods themselves.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

It must be admitted that in construing a statute, the literal and grammatical meaning of the words is not to be restrained by any conjecture as to the probable intention of the Legislature, which may be founded on previous legislation. But when the clause in question is read with the aid of the interpretation clause, I think the construction which I adopt completely satisfies the words. On this point I concur in the opinion of Lord Kyllachy, whose reasoning I think it unnecessary to repeat. But even if the enactment were applicable to pledges by the real owners of goods, I should still dissent from the construction by which it is held to alter the law with reference to the completion of the title of a pledgee. There can be no question as to the law as it stood before the passing of the Act. The law of Scotland was entirely in accordance with the doctrine laid down by Baron Parke in Farina v. Home,¹ with reference to a wharfinger's warrant, very similar in its terms to the warehouse-keeper's certificate now in question. "This warrant is no more than an engagement by the wharfinger to deliver to the consignee or anyone he may appoint. And the wharfinger's possession is that of the consignee until an assignment has taken place, and the wharfinger has attorned, so to speak, to the assignee, and agreed with him to hold for him. Then, and not till then, the wharfinger is the agent or bailee of the assignee, and his possession is that of the assignee, and then only is there a constructive delivery to him. In the meantime the warrant and the indorsement of the warrant is nothing more than an offer to hold the goods as the warehouseman of the assignee." The claimer's argument is in effect that this law is now entirely altered, because the enactment he relies on means that a pledge of goods may be effectually carried out, and the pledgee's title completed by mere indorsement and delivery of a warehouseman's certificate or other similar document, without notice to the custodian of the goods, and without attornment by him to the pledgee. If this had been the intention of the Legislature, I think it would have been so enacted in terms.

In considering the particular facts of this case with reference to the provisions of the statute, it appears to me to be doubtful whether the delivery of the warehouse-keeper's certificate can be properly described as a pledge of documents of title. It appears to me to have been delivered as an instrument for carrying out a contract to impledge the goods to which it relates. But at all events it is not by the law of Scotland a pledge of the goods; because there can be no completed pledge without transfer of possession, and the pledgee has not been put in possession, inasmuch as the transfer of the warrant was not intimated to the warehouse-keeper. It follows that the goods were still open to be attached by an arrestment used by creditors of the owner.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of the same opinion which I some time ago expressed as Lord Ordinary. But I desire to add a few sentences by way of further explanation, and, in the first place, to state a little more fully the view which I take as to the general scheme and scope of the Factors Act of 1889.

I hold that that Act—like the previous Factors Acts which it consolidates and amends—deals exclusively with a limited class of transactions, No. 139. viz., those by which rights over goods are constituted in favour of bona fide third parties, by persons who are not themselves the real owners of the goods, but are interposed persons who have apparently full powers of disposition, and are so placed by reason of something done or permitted by the real owners.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglish.

The earlier Acts did not go beyond the more common and conspicuous types of such transactions. These were (1) Liens (1st Act, Geo. IV. c. 83 ; Act of 1889, sec. 7) obtained by consignees for advances to consignors, who, as agents for the true owners or otherwise, had been permitted by the latter to ship goods in their own names ; (2) Sales (2d Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 94 ; Act of 1889, sec. 2) by mercantile agents who had been entrusted by the true owner with the possession of the goods or documents of titles to the goods ; (3) Pledges (3d Act, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 39 ; Act of 1889, sec. 2),—that is to say, contracts or agreements by such mercantile agents pledging or constituting a lien over the goods or documents of title entrusted to them.

The later Act—that of 1889—carried the principle a step further ; extending it to a fourth and cognate class of transactions, viz., contracts of sale or of pledge by vendors or vendees of goods, who, having either no power or only a qualified power of disposition, have yet been left or put in possession of goods, or document of title to goods, in such circumstances as to confer an apparently absolute power of disposal. Such persons transacting whether by way of sale or of security, with bona fide third parties, are assimilated by the Act of 1889 to mercantile agents ; so that rights granted by them cannot be challenged or defeated by vendors or vendees, who (by virtue of lien or ownership) would, but for the Act, have had right to do so.

This, I apprehend, is the full extent to which the ground covered by the Factors Acts extends ; and if I am right in this, it follows that under the later, as under the earlier Acts, the operation of the enactments is confined to transactions where there are three parties, whom, for shortness, I may call (1) the owner ; (2) the apparent owner ; (3) the bona fide buyer or security holder deriving right from the apparent owner. It also follows that the enactments operate, not by creating rights of the nature of real rights good as against all the world, but contract or personal rights, good against the true owner, on the principle of implied authority or personal bar.

That, speaking generally, appears to me to be the scheme and scope of the Factors Acts, including the Act of 1889. It may be affirmed, I think, with certainty, that unless on the now suggested construction of section 3 of the Act of 1889, there is not a single enactment of that Act, or of the previous Acts, which professes to touch transactions in which the true owner is himself the consigner, the seller, or the granter of the security.

Neither is there a single enactment which touches the general law with respect to the completion of title either in sales or securities. On the contrary, the rights constituted are throughout personal rights as distinguished from real rights—rights taking effect not by any assumed completion of title, but by being declared good as against true owners on the principle I have above expressed.

Now, if this be so, it must, I think, be acknowledged that there is at

No. 139. least a considerable presumption against the suggested construction of section 3 of the Act of 1889. It becomes ex hypothesi a section which introduces matter wholly foreign to the whole scope and purpose of the Factors Acts. It becomes so in two respects—(1) as establishing a rule of general law with respect to transactions where there is no interposition of an apparent owner; and (2) as establishing a rule of general law with respect, not to the constitution of personal rights (iura ad rem), but to the constitution and perfection of real rights (iura in re). It is of course possible that such may have been the intention of the Legislature, but it is scarcely probable. At all events, a construction of the section must, it is thought, be preferred which—giving due force to its terms—confines its operation (1) to dispositions by way of pledge by mercantile agents; and (2) to the constitution by such agents of personal rights as against their principals.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglia.

What, then, is the true construction of section 3? The answer, I think, is that the construction is just the same as that of the corresponding clause in the 4th section of the previous Act of 1842. In other words, section 3 neither declared nor introduced any doctrine or rule of general law; but provided only that, for the purposes of the Act, a pledge of goods—that is to say, a contract of pledge of goods—may be constituted by a contract impledging the document of title representing the goods. The contract assumed is of course a contract by a mercantile agent, or by one of the persons assimilated by the Act to mercantile agents; for, ex hypothesi, the Act only applies to the contracts of such persons. It is also necessarily a contract and nothing more; for as against the owner nothing more is needed, and the Act aims at nothing more. But the effect and substance of the enactment just is, that the owner shall not escape because the transaction takes the form of an impledgment of documents in place of a direct impledgment of goods. Section 3 in this view is truly an interpretation clause; and its purpose would have been equally served if in section 1 (the interpretation clause of the Act) there had been added, say to the definition of pledge, these words, “and (for the purposes of the Act) a contract pledging or giving a lien or security on documents of title to goods shall be deemed and taken to be a contract pledging or giving a lien or security over the goods themselves.”

I am not sure that such an exegesis was strictly necessary under the Act of 1842. It may there have been introduced (section 4) ob maiorem cautelam. But it is a material observation that, in the Act of 1889, it was necessary. In particular, it was absolutely necessary to the completeness of section 2, subsection 1, and also of sections 4 and 5. Applying, as it did, to sale as well as pledge, section 2, subsection 1, omitted altogether the case of an impledgment of documents; and sections 4 and 5 (though not for the same reason) did the same thing.

It is no doubt true that the language of section 3 of the Act of 1889 differs somewhat from the language of the corresponding clause in section 4 of the Act of 1842. The last named clause provided that “all contracts pledging, &c., documents of title, shall be deemed and taken to be pledges, &c., of the goods to which the same relates.” Section 3 of the 1889 Act, on the other hand, provides shortly, “a pledge of documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods.” But it has never, so far as I know, been suggested that this change of expression made any difference in the construction. The truth, I apprehend, is that the interpretation clause of the Act of 1889 (section 1) voce Pledge, has been held, and rightly held, to supply what was required to make the old clause and the new clause strictly coincident. Robertson &

Baxter v.
Inglis.

I therefore conclude that the reclaimer's case fails, so far as it rests upon the supposed effect of section 3 of the Act of 1889.

With respect to sections 8 and 9 of that Act, I adhere to the opinion that they have no application. Baxter and Goldsmith did not stand in the relation of vendor and vendee; nor was Baxter exercising any rights of vendor in arresting for his debt. His contract of sale to Goldsmith had been long before executed; and the case is exactly the same as if the arrestment had been laid on by some fourth party—e.g., a creditor of Goldsmith in some wholly extrinsic debt.

As to section 10, it has no application, for the same reason, and also because as between Goldsmith and Inglis (they being the original transferor and transferee of the documents of title), the common law is unaltered. And the common law both in England and Scotland is that a transfer of documents of title (other than Bills of Lading) has no effect without intimation and attornment.—Connal v. Loder,¹ Farina v. Homa.²

I may also point out two, as it seems to me, startling results of the reclaimer's argument.

1. As already stated, section 10 of the Act leaves the common law operative with respect to documents of title passing (on an original sale) between vendor and vendee. If, therefore, Goldsmith had sold to Inglis, and transferred the document of title to him as under a sale, there could have been (without intimation) no divestiture of possession. The vendor's lien and right to stop in transitu would have remained intact. But, according to the reclaimer's construction, section 3 makes a transfer by way of pledge operate a divestiture of possession without intimation at all.

2. It must be remembered that documents of title are of two kinds. They may be warehouse-keepers' certificates, or they may be mere delivery-orders emanating from the owner, and of which the warehouse-keeper may know nothing. This was decided in the case of Vickers v. Hertz,³ where it was also decided that documents of title may apply even to non-specific goods. It might therefore on the suggested construction happen that goods might be pledged by transfer of delivery-orders of which the warehouse-keeper knew nothing, and that he might deliver under a subsequent delivery-order, or to an arrestee under a forthcoming, and yet long afterwards might be confronted by a statutory pledge, constituted without intimation, and having of course the effect of making him responsible as from its date to a pledgee of whom he never heard.

I have only to add that I have been content to assume for the purposes of the question, that the contract of hypothecation between Goldsmith and Inglis, taken along with the indorsation of the warehouse-keeper's certificate, constituted a pledge of documents in the sense of the Act. I am not, however, satisfied that there was in the present case any pledge of documents

Baxter v.
Inglis.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—The question regards certain hogsheads of whisky which belonged to Walter C. Goldsmith of London, and were deposited in the warehouse of the Clyde Bonding Company, who issued a warrant or delivery-order bearing that the whisky was “held to the order of Walter C. Goldsmith, or assigns, by indorsement hereon.”

The competition for the whisky is between Inglis, who advanced money to Goldsmith, and received from him the agreement dated 18th June 1894, and also the delivery-order indorsed, but who did not intimate this transaction to the keeper of the warehouse, and Robertson & Baxter, who, as creditors of Goldsmith, arrested the whisky on 11th February 1895. As it happens, Goldsmith had bought the whisky from Robertson & Baxter. But they have put forward no claim as unpaid sellers, but have maintained their case as arresting creditors only. The question is, whether Inglis acquired a complete real right to the goods by the agreement and by the indorsement and delivery of the delivery-order without intimation or delivery of the whisky, or whether intimation of the transaction to the warehouse-keeper was essential to the completion of his right. The Lord Ordinary has held that his right was incomplete, and has therefore preferred the arresters.

The first question discussed is whether the decision of the case depends on the law of England, as maintained by Inglis, or on the law of Scotland, as maintained by Robertson & Baxter. I am of opinion that a question of English law might be involved. The nature of the right acquired by Inglis from Goldsmith falls to be ascertained in accordance with the law of England, seeing that both parties were Englishmen, and that the transaction between them took place in England; on the other hand, the nature and quality of the arrester's right must depend on the law of Scotland; and I have no doubt that the competition for the goods warehoused in Scotland raises a question of Scotch law. I think that is a point settled by decisions in which unintimated assignations in England have been held ineffectual in competition with arrestments in Scotland. I am, however, of opinion that Inglis has made no relevant averments about the law of England. I assent on this point to the argument for Robertson & Baxter. I am therefore shut up to consider this case as depending on the law of Scotland, on the footing that there is no special English law to which it is necessary to refer.

There can be no doubt that, at common law, Robertson & Baxter, the arresting creditors, would certainly be preferred, on the principle that a real right to moveables cannot be acquired by writing without intimation or such delivery as the circumstances admit of; that is to say, such intimation to the holder of the goods as will convert him from a holder for the grantor of the writing into a holder for the grantee. This is a rule settled, elementary and important, because otherwise the holder could not know to whom he was bound to pay or to deliver. At common law, this principle applies as much to goods held by documents of title as to other goods. Although a document of title may bear that the goods are held for the owner or his indorsee, yet the grantor will not be converted into a holder for the indorsee without intimation. On that point it is sufficient to refer to the cases of No. 139. M'Ewan v. Smith & Co.,¹ Melrose v. Hastie,² and Connal v. Loder.³

In M'Ewan v. Smith & Co.,¹ the distinction was clearly drawn between documents of title such as delivery-orders and bills of lading, to the effect that the latter did, and the former did not, pass a real right to the goods without intimation. Although *M'Ewan v. Smith & Co.*¹ was a case from Scotland, I understand that the judgment has always been treated as in accordance with the law of England.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

It is still more clear that, at common law, Inglis could not acquire a security over the goods of the nature of a right of pledge, as that right is understood in the law of Scotland. For it is plainly impossible that there can be a pledge without possession, either by the pledgee personally or by his agent. It is sufficient on that point to refer to the cases of Hamilton v. The Western Bank of Scotland,⁴ and M'Kinnon v. Nanson.⁵

Neither the agreement nor the indorsation could confer any possession on Inglis, either by himself or his agent; although it is in accordance with our law to hold that, if he intimated his right to the warehouse-keeper, he, after that intimation, would hold as his agent and on his account.

If, then, our common law knows no right of completed security or of completed pledge which, without intimation or possession, can compete with an arrestment, the question is, what difference has been effected by recent legislation? and the only Act to which, on this point, it is necessary to refer is the Factors Act, 1890, applying to Scotland the English Act of 1889. That is a consolidation Act, and it repeals the prior Factors Acts. At the same time, it re-enacts several of the provisions of the prior Acts. For example, the enumeration of documents of title is much the same as in the prior Act, and the third section of the last Act, about to be quoted, does not seem materially different from a clause in the fourth section of the Act of 1842.

The 10th section of the Act of 1889 modifies to a certain extent the law as decided in M'Ewan v. Smith,¹ for it provides that the transfer of documents of title shall have the same effect as the transfer of a bill of lading, but only to the extent of defeating a vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu, which are matters not here in question. But, except to that extent, the recognised distinction between a bill of lading and other documents of title seems to remain.

I do not see the bearing of sections 8 and 9 on the present question. I concur on that point with the Lord Ordinary, and will say no more about those sections.

The question, however, turns on section 3, which is thus expressed,—“A pledge of the documents of title shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods”; and this, as has been noticed, is a re-enactment of a provision in the Act of 1842.

It is maintained that this section, or the corresponding clause in the Act of 1842, has the effect of altering the law to the effect of providing that a completed right of security and of pledge over goods will be acquired by delivery of the documents of title without intimation to the holder of the goods and without possession, which will prevail against a subsequent arrestment, contrary to what has hitherto been held to be the settled law of Scotland. That, indeed, is not enacted expressly, but it is said that it must be inferred.

The Lord Ordinary designates this a startling proposition, and I agree that it is. It might have been expected that if it was intended to alter a settled rule of law, that would have been done expressly, and not left to a mere inference from a clause in an Act which relates to totally different matters. It is, I think, antecedently highly probable that no such effect was intended. Nevertheless, startling or not, if such be the necessary import of the words, they must of course receive effect.

I am unable to adopt the view that this section can be read as applicable only to mercantile agents. The words seem to me too unequivocal to permit of that limited construction, and I feel bound to read section 3 as involving the proposition that a pledge by an owner of goods of documents of title to the goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods.

I am unable to see why, if that be the meaning of the section, any limitation should be put on its scope and effect merely for the reason that it occurs in a Factors Act and is associated with provisions about factors; indeed, I have difficulty in realising what limitations are suggested.

Now, if that be the meaning of the clause, and if the clause so interpreted be applied to the present case, this conclusion is unavoidable, that if there was a pledge of the delivery-order or warrant for the whisky by Goldsmith it must be deemed to be a pledge of the whisky in the sense of the Factors Act. Up to this point I go along with the argument for the claimant Inglis, the indorsee of the delivery-order. But when it is said that this is conclusive of the case, I venture to think that this is not so, and that more than one question remains over. I shall mention only these two,—(1) Whether the transaction between Goldsmith and Inglis was a pledge of a document of title, that is, of the delivery-order; and (2) whether, if it was, and if it effected a pledge of the goods in the sense of the Factors Act, such a pledge was preferable to the arrestment.

1. Did the transaction amount to a pledge of the delivery-order, which I assume to be a document of title? The transaction was effected by the execution of the agreement, dated 18th December 1894, and also by the indorsation of a delivery-order. I have considerable difficulty in understanding the agreement, which bears that Goldsmith thereby deposits with Inglis the wines and spirits specified, which is not so much a legal fiction as an obvious untruth. It refers to the spirits and wines in a schedule. Whatever may be its effect, it would not be incorrect to describe it as a contract giving security on goods. The delivery-order (also printed in the appendix) relates only to one item in the schedule; whether there were delivery-orders applicable to the other items of the schedule does not appear. But considering this deed in the first place, and supposing there had been no indorsed delivery-order, I think it clear that it would not of itself confer a security which would compete with a subsequent arrestment; but that, if it were intimated to the warehouse-keeper, it would. It might not enable Inglis to obtain the goods from the warehouse-keeper, who would be entitled to demand his delivery-order indorsed, but it would convert the warehouse-keeper from a holder for Goldsmith into a holder for Inglis. It is to be noticed that this deed does not purport to pledge the documents of title, but the goods themselves. It bears no reference to any delivery-order or delivery-orders. Of itself, it would be such a title as might possibly be complete in England, but would require intimation for competition with a Scotch arrestment.

No. 139.
Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

The indorsation of the delivery-order bears no date. It might have been important to know whether it was written before or after the agreement. The Lord Ordinary notices that the indorsation was inappropriate to effect pledge. Prima facie, it conveyed an absolute right of property and not a pledge, as was held in Hamilton v. The Western Bank.¹ Certainly neither the indorsation of the delivery-order nor the agreement considered separately imported a pledge of the document of title. That the indorsation operated as effecting a pledge could only be maintained on the view that the agreement was explanatory of the indorsation, limited its otherwise absolute effect, and explained that it was meant only as indorsation to the effect of constituting a pledge. But nothing of that kind appears on the documents themselves; and I am not satisfied that the delivery-order was indorsed with any such view. It may have been indorsed only to satisfy the requirements of the warehouse-keeper. On the whole, I am inclined to think that the indorsation did not operate as a pledge, but as a conveyance of a proprietary right, but in security, just as in the case of Hamilton v. The Western Bank,¹ which on this point is closely applicable.

If this view can be entertained, it will remove at once the importance and the difficulty of the present case, for it will eliminate the third section of the Factors Act, and leave the question to the common law, which will undoubtedly pronounce the right of Inglis incomplete and inferior to that of the arrester.

2. The question whether, supposing there was a pledge of the document of title and a consequent pledge of the goods, in the sense of the statute, such a pledge would be preferable to an arrestment, appears to be more important. It is not obvious that it would be preferable. I know of no authority on the point; but in the absence of authority, I incline to the opinion that it would not. The mere fact that the right given is called a pledge is not conclusive. It is necessary to examine what the true nature of the right was, and what was the power which it conferred on the pledgee. Now possession and custody are the essential characteristics of pledge as a security, and it is these characteristics which make it so effectual as a security. It is, in truth, possession which makes a pledge a real security,—that is to say, possession either by the pledgee or by his agent; and without the power which such possession gives, I doubt whether there could be a security by pledge. Now, in this case what is called pledge has neither of these characteristics. It would not confer possession or custody. It would not of itself convert the warehouseman into a holder for Inglis. But it would put it in the power of the pledgee to obtain possession immediately

No. 139. —that is, by intimation to the warehouse-keeper, who, after such intimation, would hold for him as his agent, and whose possession would be his possession. Without intimation the so-called pledge was just in the position of any other incomplete right, and equally liable to be defeated by arrestment.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

Turning to the interpretation clause, I find that the word "pledge" includes "any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on goods." The most general meaning is that it is a contract giving security on goods. Now, if the right acquired by Inglis be read in terms of the interpretation clause, it seems to amount to this, that the delivery of the delivery-order was equivalent to a contract giving a security over the whisky. But I apprehend that by the law of Scotland a contract giving a security is not a complete and indefeasible right unless it be completed by intimation. That was the nature of the agreement actually executed, so that the indorsement of the delivery-order implied no more in regard to the goods than the agreement which was actually granted. It added nothing to the right which that contract gave, and may, as I have suggested, have been required merely to facilitate arrangements with the warehouse-keeper. If this be the true view of the third section, it does not innovate on or alter the law of Scotland at all; and I think that such a view, if it be at all admissible, is to be preferred to an interpretation which would alter by mere implication an important and settled rule of law.

It may further be observed that the argument for Inglis involves the assumption that such documents of title have been put on the same footing as bills of lading. But that assimilation is not, in my opinion, effected by this Act. Such documents of title were strongly distinguished from bills of lading in the case of M'Ewan v. Smith.¹ The distinction between them was partially removed by section 5 of the Act of 1877 and section 10 of the Act of 1889. But otherwise I consider that those distinctions still remained.

I am not aware whether this precise question has arisen in England, but I have no reason to think that in England the security would be held complete without intimation or possession or acknowledgment.

For those reasons I have come to think that the arresters ought to be preferred, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The competition between these two claimants must, I think, be determined by the law of Scotland as the law of the situs.

The question which of them is to be preferred to the fund in medio depends on whether, at the date of the arrestment used by Robertson & Baxter in the hands of the warehousemen, the goods were held by the warehousemen for Goldsmith or for Inglis. If for Goldsmith, the arrestment created a nexus on the goods entitling the arresters, as creditors of Goldsmith, to claim the goods (or their proceeds) in payment of their debt so soon as constituted. If for Inglis, the arrestment attached nothing, and Inglis would now be entitled to prevail.

At the date of the arrestment (18th February 1895) the goods stood in the books of the warehousemen in Goldsmith's name. Nevertheless the case for Inglis is that, from 18th December 1894, when he advanced £3000 on the security of these and other goods, and the delivery-order was blank indorsed to him, the warehousemen held for him. If so, they did not know it, because no intimation of the transaction had been made to them.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

Now, it is beyond dispute that by the common law of Scotland (and I believe of England also) intimation to a warehouse-keeper is necessary to complete and make effectual all rights which depend on the constructive delivery of goods in his custody. The jus in re cannot be acquired without that.

But it is said that section 3 of the Factors Act of 1889 abrogates this rule, both for factors and principals, in all questions of pledge, by making a pledge of documents of title to goods equivalent to a pledge of the goods.

I think it very doubtful whether this section of the Act contemplates principals at all. I lay no stress on the italicised heading "Dispositions by Mercantile Agents," which has no more statutory force than a rubric. But the group of sections in which section 3 is found deals with agents alone; and the three sections of the Act (sections 8, 9, and 10), which undoubtedly refer to principals, are all in perfect harmony with the main idea of a Factors Act, because they all contemplate cases of quasi-factorship, i.e., cases where one man has permitted another to be in possession of goods or documents of title, and thereby to create rights over them in favour of a bona fide third party. If, therefore, section 3 does affect pledges made directly by a principal, it is the only section of the Act which deals with transactions having no element of agency about them.

I do not, however, make that the ground of my opinion. I say that, whether the section relates to pledges by agents merely, or to pledges by all and sundry, the sole effect of it is to make a contract for the pledge of documents of title equivalent to a contract for the pledge of goods. The whole scope and tenor of the series of statutes consolidated by the Act of 1889 is to give validity to contracts made by persons entrusted with the possession of goods or documents of title, as in a question with the person entrusting them. The Act does not profess to deal with the mode of converting contract rights into real rights. To say that a pledge of documents of title to goods shall be as good against the owner of the goods as a pledge of the goods themselves does not dispense with the common law requisites for rendering the pledge effectual against the world. It does not mean, as regards the case in hand, that a pledge of the particular document of title called a warehouse-keeper's certificate shall be completed without intimation to the warehouse-keeper. So to hold would be, I think, to put a construction on the words of the statute going far beyond its leading purpose, with the result of conferring on pledges of documents a wholly anomalous privilege, and possibly of exposing custodiers of goods to inequitable claims at the instance of persons whose rights were unknown to them.

I have hitherto assumed that the transaction in question might fairly be held to be a pledge of the warehouse-keeper's certificate. But I greatly doubt whether that was its true nature. From the terms of the agreement

No. 139. printed in the appendix, it seems rather to have been a contract for the deposit of the goods themselves, carried out by indorsement of the certificate. If so, it is clear that the claimant Inglis never completed his security by obtaining possession of the goods, either actual or constructive.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD LOW.—The fact that Robertson & Baxter originally sold the goods to Goldsmith does not affect the present question. The goods were delivered to Goldsmith and became his property. Robertson & Baxter therefore appear to me to be in the same position as if they had been creditors of Goldsmith arresting goods belonging to him, with which they had had no previous connection, and with which the debt for which arrestment was used had no connection. Further, I think it plain that the sale sections of the Factors Acts have no application to the case.

The main question appears to me to be, What is the meaning and effect of section 3 of the Factors Act of 1889? To answer that question it is necessary to examine to some extent the previous Factors Acts in order to see what was their scope and effect.

In the first place, it is not unimportant to observe that the Factors Acts of 1825 and 1842 deal only with contracts or agreements for the sale or pledge of goods. Thus the second section of the Act of 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 94) provides that a person entrusted with, or in possession of, certain documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be the true owner of the goods "so far as to give validity to any contract or agreement" for the sale or the deposit or pledge of the goods.

In like manner the Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 39) proceeded upon the preamble that it was expedient that in all cases where the owner of goods would be bound "by a contract or agreement of sale" made by a mercantile agent, he should in like manner be bound "by any contract or agreement of pledge or lien for any advances bona fide made on the security thereof." Accordingly it was enacted (section 1) that any agent entrusted with the possession of goods, or documents of title to goods, "shall be deemed and taken to be the owner of such goods, so far as to give validity to any contract or agreement by way of pledge, lien, or security bona fide made with such agent."

I shall now pass on to the consideration of section 4 of the Act of 1842, because it contains a clause almost identical with section 3 of the Act of 1889, and it is important to see what is the scope of the section (in the Act of 1842) containing that clause, and to what extent and in what way the other clauses of the section are carried forward into the Act of 1889. I do not deal with the second and third sections of the Act of 1842, because they do not appear to have any bearing upon the present question. Section 2 deals with the substitution of other goods or documents of title for those originally deposited; and section 3 provides that the Act shall be deemed to give validity only to "such contracts and agreements" as are made bona fide and without notice that the agent is acting without authority or mala fide.

Coming, therefore, to section 4, I think that it may be described as being mainly, if not wholly, of the nature of an interpretation clause.

The section begins with the enumeration of a number of documents, No. 139. "which shall be deemed and taken to be a document of title within the meaning of this Act." These are the documents which are specified in exactly the same words in the first section of the Act of 1889, as being included in the expression document of title, with the exception of "India warrant," which is among the documents enumerated in the earlier Act, but is omitted from the later Act. It is important to remember that section 1 of the Act of 1889 is that which is devoted to the interpretation of terms.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglist.

The second clause of section 4 provides that an agent possessed of a document of title, obtained by reason of his having been intrusted with the possession of the goods, or of any other document of title thereto, "shall be deemed and taken to have been intrusted with the possession of the goods represented by such document of title as aforesaid."

That is of the nature of a definition of what is meant by being "intrusted with the possession of goods." The enactment is not in terms repeated in the Act of 1889, but the substance of it is contained in subsections (1) and (3) of section 2.

Section 4 then provides,—"And all contracts pledging or giving a lien upon such document of title as aforesaid shall be deemed and taken to be respectively pledges of and liens upon the goods to which the same relates."

I shall have something to say upon that clause presently, but in the meantime I pass it by, with the remark that it forms section 3 of the Act of 1889, with this difference, that the language of the latter section is "a pledge of documents of title," and not "contracts" pledging documents of title.

The next clause in section 4 is that "such agent shall be deemed to be possessed of such goods or documents whether the same shall be in his actual custody or shall be held by any other person subject to his control, or for him or on his behalf."

That clause is repeated, with only an unimportant change of phraseology, in section 1 (that is, the interpretation section), subsection (2), of the Act of 1889.

It is unnecessary to go over in detail the remaining clauses of section 4. They all provide for what shall be "deemed and taken to be" the effect of certain circumstances, and are all of the nature of interpretation clauses.

I now revert to the clause in regard to contracts pledging a document of title. It is said that the effect of that clause has been that since the date of the Act a pledge of documents of title by a factor has been as good as a pledge of the goods themselves. I am unable to assent to that view; and during the half-century which has elapsed since the passing of the Act it has never, so far as I am aware, been suggested.

If I am right in the general view which I have taken of section 4 of the Act of 1842, I think that it is plain that the clause was not a general enactment, but applied only for the purposes of the Act. The clause, I think, was intended to interpret section 1. That section provided that an agent intrusted with goods or the documents of title should be deemed to be the owner of the goods "so far as to give validity to any contract or agreement by way of pledge." The clause in section 4 seems to me to do no more than declare that the contract by way of pledge referred to in section 1 should

No. 139.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

include a contract pledging the documents of title, and that if the contract took that form, it should be held to be a contract pledging the goods.

No doubt a difficulty is created by the fact that the clause does not say that a contract pledging documents of title shall be deemed to be a contract pledging the goods, but that it shall be a pledge of the goods. If I am right, however, in regarding the clause as practically an interpretation clause, it is more easy to put upon it the construction which I suggest than if it had been one of the proper enacting clauses. If the clause was to be read literally as meaning that a contract by an agent pledging documents of title should operate a pledge of the goods, a very anomalous state of matters would have existed. In the first place, a contract for pledging documents of title would be a great deal better than a contract pledging the goods themselves, because there can be no pledge (as distinguished from a contract of pledge) without possession. Neither in England nor in Scotland is a pledge of goods possible without delivery. In the second place, if the clause was read literally, an agent could do what the owner of the goods could not do. I think that it is plain that the contracts referred to in the clause are contracts made by an agent. If, therefore, a contract by an agent pledging the documents of title created a pledge of the goods, that was a thing which the owner of the goods could not do, because he could give no pledge of the goods unless he delivered them to the pledgee. I can see no good purpose which could have been intended by introducing such a curious anomaly into the law, and it would have gone far beyond, and indeed defeated, the express purpose of the Act, which was to make contracts of pledge granted by the agent as good as if they had been granted by the owner, but no better.

I repeat that up to the time which I am now considering (i.e., 1842) the Factors Acts in terms dealt only with contract rights, and not with real rights at all. I do not think that the Act of 1842 made any change in the law in regard to such a document of title as a warehouse-keeper's certificate, except that in certain cases possession of the document was declared to be conclusive of the title to transfer. It still remained the law of England (as I understand it), as well as of Scotland, that the transfer, by indorsement or otherwise, of such a document of title did not transfer the property or possession of the goods until it was intimated to the warehouse-keeper, and apparently in England, until the warehouse-keeper had attorned to the purchaser and consented to hold the goods on his account.

If therefore this case had arisen under the Act of 1842, I should have been of opinion that, intimation of the transfer not having been made to the warehouse-keeper, there was no completed or real right of pledge which could compete with the arrestment.

The next Factors Act, namely, that of 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 39), has not, I think, any direct bearing upon this case. It consists only of four operative sections. The first of these—section 2—is, although differently expressed, practically to the same effect as subsection (2) of section 2 of the Act of 1889, and protects a person who has dealt in good faith with an agent whose authority to possess goods or documents of title has been recalled. The remaining sections, namely, 3, 4, and 5, are what are called the sale sections, and they are carried forward with some alterations, which it is not material to notice, into the Act of 1889, in which Act they are sections 8, 9, and 10. No. 139.

The main reason why the sale clauses were introduced into a Factors Act appears to have been this. In the cases of *Johnson v. Credit Lyonnais Co.*¹ and Johnson v. Blumenthal,¹ it was held that a vendor who had been left by his vendee in possession of documents of title to goods, till it suited the convenience of the buyer to accept delivery, could not under the Factors Act confer a good title upon a bona fide pledgee. I notice that the learned editors of the last edition of Smith's Leading Cases say that that judgment "created some consternation amongst commercial men," and accordingly the Act of 1877 was passed. The judgment in *Johnson's case*¹ is one among many examples of the strictness with which the English Courts have construed the Factors Acts as being intended to provide for a certain class of cases and nothing more.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

I have one other remark upon the Act of 1877. The 5th section provides that where a document of title has been lawfully transferred to a person as a vendee or owner of the goods, and that person transfers it to another, who takes the same bona fide and for valuable consideration, "the last mentioned transfer shall have the same effect for defeating any vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu as the transfer of a bill of lading has for defeating the right of stoppage in transitu."

That is the only change which is made in terms upon the common law as regards documents of title such as a warehouse-keeper's certificate, and it assimilates such a document to a bill of lading only in one case (namely, as between a transferee or vendee and a second transferee), and only to the effect of defeating the vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu.

So standing the law in 1877, I come now to the Act of 1889, and I would point out, in the first place, that section 10 re-enacts section 5 of the Act of 1877. Presumably therefore the law was not altered as regarded documents of title,—that is to say, such documents as warehouse-keepers' certificates or delivery-orders were not assimilated to bills of lading to any greater extent than they were by the 5th section of the Act of 1877.

That would not be the case, however, if section 3 of the Act of 1889 was to be read literally and as of universal application. If it was to be so read, then in the case of pledge a warehouse-keeper's certificate or delivery-order would be to all effects equivalent to a bill of lading.

That would amount to a practical repugnancy between the two sections of the Act (the third and the tenth), and a construction which would lead to that result is, if possible, to be avoided. And it can be avoided if section 3 can be construed as being practically a re-enactment of the relative clause in the Act of 1842. In my opinion the section is capable of such a construction.

In the first place, I do not think that the fact that section 3 speaks of "a pledge of documents of title," while the relative clause in the Act of 1842 speaks of "contracts pledging" documents of title, is so important as at first sight might appear.

I have already pointed out that the Acts of 1825 and 1842 deal only

No. 139. with "contracts and agreements" for the sale or pledge of goods. In the Act of 1889 these words are throughout omitted, and the expression used is "any sale, pledge, or other disposition of goods," where in the earlier Act it would have been "any contract or agreement."

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

I do not think that it is material to consider whether this change in the phraseology of the Act was more than a mere change of expression. What does seem important is (1) that there is no suggestion (apart from section 3) that any alteration was made in the law in regard to what was necessary for the constitution of a real right in and to goods; and (2) that the change of phraseology in the Act seems to explain how section 3 came to be expressed as it is. It is just the clause in section 4 of the Act of 1842 with the word "contracts" struck out, and I think that it serves the same purpose as the clause in section 4 did.

Section 3 must be read in connection with subsection (5) of section 1, which provides that "the expression pledge shall include any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on goods." Now, if these words are read into any of the sections in the first part of the Act, except section 3, they create no difficulty. Take for example section 2, subsection (1). That section provides that "any sale pledge or other disposition of goods" made by a mercantile agent shall be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner to make it. If the interpretation clause was read into that section the words which I have last quoted would run, "any sale pledge or other disposition of goods, and any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on the goods." That of course is quite intelligible and unambiguous. But it is clear that the definition of the expression "pledge" cannot be read into section 3, upon the first occasion upon which the word is used. I take it, therefore, that the expression, "a pledge of documents of title to goods," must be read according to the ordinary meaning of the language, and as referring to the transfer of the documents of title in pledge. But upon the second occasion upon which the word "pledge" is used—"pledge of goods"—there is no reason why it should not have the full meaning ascribed to it by the first section. It may therefore mean either (1) a pledge of goods, or (2) a contract pledging goods, or (3) a contract giving a lien or security on goods. In a question between the pledger (whether owner or mercantile agent) and the pledgee, it may well be that a pledge of the documents of title is made equivalent to a pledge of the goods. But it is different in a question with a third party, such as a creditor arresting the goods. In such a case to hold a pledge of the documents as a pledge of the goods would be to introduce a serious alteration into the law in regard to what is necessary to constitute a real right in and to the goods. If, however, a pledge of the documents is, in such a case, only deemed to be a contract pledging or giving a security on the goods, the difficulty disappears, because the real right of the arresting creditor would prevail over the contract right of the pledgee. That appears to me to be sufficient for the solution of the present question.

I am inclined to think, however, that section 3 is to a great extent of the nature of an interpretation clause. I have already commented upon section 4 of the Act of 1842, and shewn how the various clauses of that section, in so far as they were continued, were dealt with in the Act of 1889. The framer of the latter Act seems to have regarded some of the clauses of section 4 of the former Act as purely interpretive, and accordingly they reappear in section 1. Other clauses he regarded as being more of the nature of independent enactments, and accordingly they are brought into the operative clauses. That, I think, accounts for the enactment in section 3 appearing where it does. But reading the Act as a whole, and having regard to the purpose of the Act, and the history of previous legislation on the subject, I think that the effect which section 3 was chiefly intended to have would have been accomplished if the interpretation clause had provided that the expression "pledge of goods" should include "pledge of documents of title to goods." Such an interpretation of the expression "pledge of goods" is necessary to give full effect to some of the enacting clauses, and if that interpretation is not to be found in section 3, it is not in the Act. Take, for example, section 2, subsection (1), which I have more than once cited as dealing with "any sale, pledge, or other disposition of goods." Now, even if that section is amplified by reading in subsection (5) of section 1, it does not include a pledge of documents of title, unless section 3 warrants the word "pledge" being so read.

No. 139.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglist.

Then take section 4, which provides that "where a mercantile agent pledges goods" for an antecedent debt, the pledgee shall acquire no further right to the goods than could have been enforced by the pledger at the time.

Now, it seems to me that the reason of that enactment applies as strongly to a pledge of documents of title as to a pledge of goods, but the enactment does not, in fact, do so, unless section 3 authorises "pledge of goods" to be read as including "pledge of documents of title."

The question, therefore, is, whether the words of section 3 are capable of being construed as meaning that, as used in the Act, the expression "pledge of goods" shall include "pledge of the documents of title to goods"? The words used are "a pledge of documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods." The suggestion I understand to be that the meaning of these words is that anyone may now pledge goods by transferring the documents of title. That, however, is not what the section says, and if that is what was intended, it is very badly expressed. A pledge of documents of title and a pledge of goods are entirely different things. If what was intended was to recognise documents of title as symbols of the goods, and to declare that a pledge of the goods might be completed by a transference or by delivery of the documents, it would have been very easy to say so, and if that was what was intended, I can hardly imagine that so simple a proposition would have been stated in such a misleading way.

Where the Act says that a pledge of the documents "shall be deemed" to be a pledge of the goods, I think that it means "for the purpose of the Act." The position of the section, and its history, point in that direction. Further, I think that the words "deemed to be a pledge of goods" must be construed as meaning "are included in the expression pledge of goods." The words, I think, are capable of that meaning, because it seems to me that there would have been no difficulty in so reading them if they had formed part of what bore to be an interpretation clause. Let me give an

No. 139. example : Suppose that a mercantile agent pledged a document of title to goods, without the authority of the owner, and the latter challenged the pledgee's right on the ground that section 1 only applied to a pledge of goods. I think that the pledgee's answer would be that, by virtue of section 3, a pledge of the documents of title was, for the purposes of the Act, to be deemed a pledge of the goods.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

There is another and shorter ground, in my opinion, for holding that section 3 is not applicable to this case.

If that section is of universal application, and means that a pledge—that is, a real and completed pledge—of a warehouse-keeper's certificate is a real and completed pledge of the goods, then I think that it must be strictly applied, and that no case could be held to fall within it which was not strictly and literally included in the words used.

Now here the certificate was indorsed and delivered to Inglis, but that of itself proves nothing. A certificate may be indorsed and delivered for the purpose of carrying out a variety of contracts. It may be designed to carry out a contract for the sale of the goods, or for putting the goods in trust, or for creating a security over the goods, or for pledging the goods, or for pledging the certificate itself.

Here there is no dispute in regard to the contract. It is contained in what is called the agreement of hypothecation or deposit. By that agreement Goldsmith deposited with Inglis, not the document of title, but the goods, and it is admitted that the certificate was indorsed and delivered in pursuance of that agreement. Where, then, was the pledge of the document of title ? In my opinion it did not exist.

It is said that the certificate was held by Inglis in security, and was therefore pledged. I do not think that it was held by Inglis in security. It was indorsed to him in order that he might be able to make real the contract of pledge of the goods by obtaining possession of them. Until that was done by intimation to the warehouse-keeper there was a contract of pledge of the goods, but there could not be any real pledge ; and that, so far as I can judge, is in accordance with the law of England as well as the law of Scotland.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD PEARSON.—The first question is, by which law this case is to be decided. It may be necessary to be informed, in the first instance, what are the rights and obligations of the contracting parties in England, so far as these are peculiar to English law. But I entertain no doubt that Scots law must in the end decide upon the competition of alleged real rights in moveables locally situated in Scotland ; and that we are entitled to carry our examination of the matter back to the point at which it is alleged that the real right accrued in order to ascertain whether the requirements of Scots law have been substantially observed. Thus, if intimation be necessary to complete the real right in Scotland, the question whether it has been made must be determined by the law of Scotland ; and I am further of opinion that the question whether intimation is necessary must also be determined by that law. All this seems to me to follow from the principles recognised in the cases of Donaldson v. Ord,¹ and The Scottish Provident Institution,² No. 139. and, indeed, to have been expressly there decided.

The former case turned on a competition of rights under an English creditor deed and a Scotch arrestment. There was, indeed, a preliminary and separable ground for repelling the defences in that case, going to the competency of the defence. But the Court also decided upon the competition itself; and the decree (at page 1071 of the report) finds separatim that the defenders' claim of priority "would resolve into a competition of diligence as to the attachment of a fund situated in Scotland, and that such competition must be determined by the rules of the law of Scotland."

Mar 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Ing'lis.

The same principle was recognised and followed in the recent case of The Scottish Provident Institution,² where the exposition of the law to this effect by the Lord Ordinary was adopted by the First Division. The competition there was between a trustee in bankruptcy and an English depository of a life policy. There was an admission as to the law of England, to the effect that the deposit of the policy operated as an equitable mortgage, and that if followed by notice to the company it conferred a preferable right. But the English law was invoked only as to the first of these points; and the fact that parties admitted that intimation was required and was sufficient by English law, renders it all the more significant that the question as to intimation was there examined and adjudged on according to the rules of Scots law, as is plain from the Lord Ordinary's note at page 114. The true application of that case to the present seems to have been entirely missed by the reclainer, who even goes so far as to say that it overruled the case of Donaldson v. Ord,¹ although the Lord Ordinary referred to that case in support of his opinion.

Here we have an arrestment of goods situated in Scotland, laid on by a creditor of the true owner. According to our law, that gives the arresting creditor, if he be duly diligent, a nexus over the goods with which no prior right can compete unless it be a jus in re. It is therefore necessary to examine the nature of the prior right here alleged, and the grounds on which a preference is claimed.

The right is constituted by two documents. The one is described as an agreement of deposit or hypothecation, which, according to its tenor, professes to record an instant and actual deposit of specified goods as a security for repayment of an advance of £3000 with interest; and it further gives a power of sale. The other is a delivery-order issued by the keeper of a bonded warehouse, which declares that the goods are "held to the order of Walter C. Goldsmith or assigns by indorsement hereon"; and it is blank indorsed by Goldsmith. This indorsement was, I suppose, made for all the purposes of the contract—namely (1) for the purpose of enabling Ing'lis to make his pledge real, if it were not so to begin with, and (2) to enable him effectually to sell under the power.

The combined effect of these documents upon the rights of the contracting parties themselves is primarily a question of English law. But when that is ascertained, I apprehend that the law of Scotland must determine the effect of the contract as leaving or not leaving the goods themselves

Inglis.

I am not aware whether or to what extent the English law differs from ours as to the primary effect of such a contract. The reclaimer's averments on that matter are so uncertain and present so many inconsistent alternatives that I regard them as of doubtful relevancy.

Certainly, according to Scots law, as hitherto laid down, these documents do not constitute a pledge at all, either of documents of title or of the goods themselves. They are not a pledge of documents of title to goods, because the transfer of the delivery-order is in terms an absolute transfer. They are not a pledge of the goods, because a pledge cannot be constituted by constructive delivery. The true import and effect of such documents is well settled. In the case of Hamilton v. The Western Bank,¹ documents which in all material respects seem to me indistinguishable from the documents in this case were held not to constitute a pledge, but a transference of property, ex facie absolute, though truly in security. As is well known, the case itself (with the exception of the opinions) is badly reported; but it has been expounded once and again by high authority to the effect I have stated, in the cases of The National Bank v. Forbes,² and Mackinnon v. Nanson & Co.,³ and so far as I know, it has never been judicially challenged.

If the matter be tested by Scots law, therefore, there is here no pledge of the documents of title to goods; and if so, whatever may be the meaning and effect of the third section of the Factors Act, 1889, it has no application here.

If, on the other hand, the explanation of the effect of these documents as between the contracting parties is to be furnished by the law of England, it would be necessary to ascertain definitely what that law says upon the matter; and this has not been done. That law may differ from our law on the subject. It may be that, according to English law, a pledge (in the fullest sense) is constituted by the possession of a custodier as agent of the creditor. But if such custodier begins by being the debtor's agent, I am unable to see how he can be made to hold for the creditor otherwise than by some proceeding analogous to our "intimation." Constructive possession can hardly be complete without notice, any more than actual possession is complete without delivery. Without these, there may conceivably be a personal contract of impledgement, but I do not see how there can be the real right of pledge.

Therefore, in my opinion, it would not be enough for Inglis to make out that these documents do, according to English law, import a pledge of documents of title to goods within the meaning of the Factors Act. In view of the interpretation clause, that proposition is quite consistent with the "pledge" being not the real right, but a personal contract; and if the latter, it cannot compete with an arresting creditor. In order to reach that result, some law must be appealed to which enjoins that the contract between Goldsmith and Inglis is to be deemed effectual to constitute a jus in re in goods situate in Scotland, and that not merely between the contracting parties, but to all effects and against outside creditors. Apart from the Factors Act, this cannot be done; and I am unable to adopt the reclaimer's argument upon the third section of that Act. That section is now part of the law of Scotland; but I can find no sufficient reason either in the section itself, or in its context, or in the statute of which it forms part, for attributing to it so wide a meaning. I have an impression that it really has a comparatively modest intention, and that its true purpose is to serve as an interpretation clause to section 2, and to make it clear that the pledge of goods there dealt with included pledge of the documents of title. But at all events I cannot regard section 3 as importing that when and so long as a delivery-order is out, the goods which it represents are practically withdrawn from effective diligence, even in a case where the warehouse-keeper knows nothing of the right of the person for whom he holds, and has no means of finding out who or where he is.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

It may be suggested that in this matter of intimation there is a distinction between a delivery-order issued by the warehouse-keeper himself "to A or assigns by indorsement hereon" (as in this case), and a delivery-order issued by one of the parties themselves, and indorsed and delivered to the other without the knowledge of the warehouse-keeper, as in Hamilton v. The Western Bank.¹ It might seem as if the intimation, which is plainly necessary in the latter case in order to turn the custodier into the holder for the transferee, is not needed in the former case, where the custodier has himself issued a document in favour of A and his indorsee which he is bound to honour. But in the first place no such distinction is recognised in the Factors Act; for both types of documents are equally within the definition of "documents of title." Further, according to my understanding of the law, notice to the custodier is as necessary in the one case as in the other. And be it observed, that it is necessary (at least according to our law) not merely in order to put the custodier in mala fide to deliver to anyone else, but also for the separate and important purpose of divesting him of possession for the one party, and investing him with possession for the other. Even where the order is in favour of indorsee, the document has not the full negotiability of a bill of lading, and does not operate otherwise than as a personal contract or engagement, until by notice the custodier has become the indorsee's agent to hold—Farina v. Home.²

It is true that the tenth section of the Factors Act effects a change in the legal status of all documents of title to goods in certain circumstances, and assimilates them to bills of lading to a certain limited effect; but that seems to me not to touch the question now in hand.

I may add here by the way, as the question has been mooted, that this case does not appear to me to depend in any degree upon the provisions of sections 8 and 9. It is here a mere incident that the arresting creditor's debt happens to be the unpaid balance of the price of the very goods in question. The contract of sale to Goldsmith had long been completely executed, and I think the case must be taken as if the arrestment had been laid on by a wholly extraneous creditor. If so, I do not see that sections 8 and 9 have any application to the circumstances of this case.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

It may be thought that the definition clause of the Factors Act, 1889, gives weight to the argument that in this whole class of cases the distinction between a pledge properly so called, and a personal contract or engagement to pledge, is no longer material. That clause enacts that "for the purposes of this Act . . . (5) the expression 'pledge' shall include any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on goods, whether in consideration of an original advance or of any further or continuing advance or of any pecuniary liability." I draw quite a different inference from these words. They appear to me to import that the Act is dealing alike with personal engagements to pledge, and with pledges properly so called, and therefore that the Act has no concern with the priorities flowing from the acquisition of real rights, but only with the contractual incidents.

If the third section is to have in this case the wide and absolute meaning contended for, and if it was applied to Scotland by way of assimilating the laws, the result will rather be in the opposite direction. If I am right in what I have said as to the Scots law which is applicable if these transactions had been entirely Scottish, a new anomaly has been introduced by section 3 in that case as compared with a case where the attachment is laid on in the one country and the documents of title are transferred in the other. For unless the rule of *Hamilton v. The Western Bank*¹ is to be regarded as done away with, the purely Scottish case will have to be decided quite differently from the Anglo-Scottish one. And I cannot assent to the view that section 3 not only overrules Hamilton v. The Western Bank,¹ but also introduces the new rule that every pledge of a document of title to goods situate in Scotland is now to be held to operate as a completed pledge of the goods themselves to all effects, and that whether intimation is made to the custodian or not.

In my opinion the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case to be dealt with may be shortly stated thus:—A deposited goods in a bonded warehouse in Glasgow, the keeper of which issued a delivery-order bearing that they were held "to the orders of A or assignees by endorsement hereon." B advanced money to A under an agreement by which A deposited the goods with B in security of the advance, and gave B power to sell them without A's consent. A, by an undated indorsation, indorsed and delivered to B the delivery-order of the warehouse-keeper. The agreement was entered into and the relative delivery of the indorsed warrant took place in England, both A and B being resident there. No intimation was made to the warehouse-keeper. Subsequently, and while matters were in this position, C (merchants in Glasgow), being creditors of A, arrested the goods in the hands of the warehouseman on the dependence of an action raised by them against A for a debt due by A to C, and in which decree was obtained. Pending further procedure, and in order to release the goods, which were of higher value than C's claim, a sum was deposited in bank to meet C's claim if found good. C now claims this sum under the decree, maintaining that the arrestment was effectual. B resists C's claim, maintaining that by the agreement and delivery of the indorsed delivery-order to him the goods were pledged or otherwise transferred in security to him, so as to give him a preferable right to any claim founded on the arrestment used by C. No. 139.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

Such being the case presented, there is no question of fact in dispute between the parties, but two questions of law have been raised in the pleadings—(1) whether the case falls to be decided by the law of England or by the law of Scotland; and (2) assuming that it is to be decided by the law of Scotland, must it be decided in favour of B, the holder of the indorsed delivery-order, either at common law or in respect of what is contained in the Factors Acts, 1889 and 1890.

As regards the first question, it is the unanimous opinion of the consulted Judges that the case must be decided according to the law of Scotland. That is also my opinion. The cases quoted in the argument seem to bear this out distinctly. The question does not turn upon the contract between Goldsmith, who is A, and Inglis, who is B, but upon Inglis' (B) right having been made real, so that he can maintain it effectively against any other person claiming a right to the goods in Scotland in respect of diligence duly done to attach them. It is in this country that the nexus must be laid on, if a right of priority is to be made sure. And although the documents passing between him and Goldsmith (A) and the rights he possesses by his holding the delivery-order indorsed, must be decided as regards the contractual effect between him and Goldsmith (A) by the law of England, where the contract was made, it is not this contractual question which is to be decided here. It is whether the effect of what was done by the contracting parties placed Inglis' (B) rights to the goods in Scotland on such a basis as to exclude the effective operation of diligence done in Scotland according to the rules and practice of Scotland, so that it is a question between an arresting creditor arresting in Scotland and the party who is said to have received rights to the goods by the contract in England. The question by what law such a case relating to goods warehoused in Scotland is to be dealt with is in my view expressly decided by the case of Donaldson v. Ord.¹ There is no later case in which anything to the contrary is to be found, and I entirely agree with what has been pointed out by Lord Pearson in his opinion, that the subsequent case of *The Scottish Provident Institution*² does not derogate from, but confirms, the operation of the principle so distinctly stated in *Donaldson's*¹ case, viz., that in a case such as this the arrester's claim of priority "would resolve into a competition of diligence as to the attachment of a fund situated in Scotland, and that such a competition must be determined by the rules of the law of Scotland."

The case therefore must be decided, if in favour of Inglis, either on the ground that by the common law of Scotland Inglis (B) had a jus in re to the goods, so as to prevent Robertson & Baxter's (C) diligence being operative, or if that be not according to the common law, then on the ground that by statutory enactment the law has been altered. On the first point there

No. 139.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

does not seem to be any difficulty. Whatever were the rights which Inglis (B) had by his contract with Goldsmith (A) and his possession of the indorsed delivery-order, it is certain that intimation was essential to make his right such that the diligence of creditors of Goldsmith (A) should be inoperative. Inglis (B) therefore has recourse to the Factors Act of 1889, which is applied to Scotland by the subsequent Act of 1890. Under that Act he maintains that as it is declared by section 3 that a pledge of the documents of title is to be deemed to be a pledge of the goods, he is entitled to prevail. Three questions present themselves here—(1) Is the transaction a pledge of the documents of title? (2) If it is, does the 3d section of the Factors Act apply, seeing that the transaction was not by a factor but by the owner himself? (3) Assuming that these questions are answered in the affirmative, is the transaction without intimation good to exclude Robertson & Baxter's (C) diligence from operative effect?

First, then, was this transaction a pledge of the documents of title? It can only have been so if the indorsing of the delivery-order to Inglis constituted a pledge. But the evidence of the footing on which that indorsation was made is contained in the agreement upon which it followed. That contract bears to deposit the goods with Inglis, and it makes no reference to the delivery-order. It was to carry out that agreement that the delivery-order was indorsed to him. There was in that no pledge of the document of title. The indorsation enabled him to take over what was given him by contract by obtaining possession, actual or constructive. If that be so, then there is no room for the application of the 3d section of the Factors Act, however wide may be its scope. The purpose of the indorsation was, as I think, not to pledge the document of title, but to enable the indorsee to make the contract for the goods effectual—to make the right given by it real by possession. The delivery-order as indorsed had here no limited effect. It had the full effect of such an indorsed order, so that the warehouse-keeper could have had no answer to a demand for the goods, and Goldsmith (A) was sufficiently divested of proprietorship by the indorsation, provided that it was followed by intimation. The indorsation was not a transaction of the quality of pledge, but a conveyance of a right, although in security.

2. On the assumption that this view is wrong, and that what was done was of the nature of pledge of the document of title, the next question is—Do the Factors Acts operate in the case, not of a factor or agent, but where the transaction is one in which the true owner himself contracts? Another way of stating this question is—Do the Factors Acts deal with all transactions whether entered into by a principal or by a factor for a principal, or do they deal with a less extensive class of transactions—the class where persons, not the real owners of goods, but who in consequence of what the real owners do or allow to be done, have apparent power of transaction under that power, and contract with third parties? The whole scope of the Acts seems to me to be directed towards the giving of validity as against the true owner to the acts of contract done by one put forward, or allowed by him to act, as having the powers of owner, as if they had been done by the owner himself. And the words of the Act appear to me, without any straining in construction, to read only as meaning that a contract of pledge of documents of title made by an agent intrusted with these shall be as effectual a contract against the owner for pledging the goods as would be a contract of pledge of the goods themselves. That this was so under the Act of 1842 is clear, for, as has been pointed out, the clause in that Act which declares that contracts pledging or giving a lien on documents of title shall be deemed and taken to be respectively pledges or liens upon the goods to which the same relate, is a clause which throughout deals with contracts by persons intrusted with documents of title, by declaring what force they shall have. And accordingly a wider effect was denied to it in the case of M' Ewan v. Smith,¹ where a delivery-order to the order of a buyer was held not to be effectual to transfer the property, it being practically held that the Act did not affect transactions in which the owner himself was the contracting party, but related only to cases where a purchaser has dealt with one who had an apparent authority from another, on the faith of that authority.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

But it is said that although this may be so as regards the Act of 1842, the 3d section of the consolidating statute has a more extended effect, and applies to all transactions whether of agent or principal. It is true that the words of the 3d section are different from those of the corresponding section in the Act of 1842. But I agree with the majority of the consulted Judges in holding that the scope of the Factors Act of 1889 is to deal with one class of cases, that of persons not the real owners of goods, but having through the act of the true owner apparent full power of disposing of them, dealing with third parties, who in good faith transact with them as having such power. Accordingly the Act operates by giving effectuality against the true owner to contractual personal rights acquired by third parties from the interposed party, making the contract effectual against the granter and the person whom the granter holding the document of title represented. But I do not see ground for holding that the recent Act goes any further than the Act of 1842 did. The later Act when examined seems to do what was done by the Act of 1842, and nothing more.

The interpretation clause of the Act of 1889 declares that pledge when used in the statute shall include any contract pledging or giving a lien or security on goods, and if pledge in the latter part of section 3 be so read, it has a perfectly intelligible meaning and effect, and is consistent with the enactments of which the Act containing it bears to be a consolidation. And in that view the transaction in this case would confer upon Inglis a personal right only as distinguished from a real right, good against third parties such as creditors. On the other hand, if the clause be read in accordance with the contention of Inglis, then that reading practically gives to the indorsation and handing over of a delivery-order the full effect which by law attaches to the transfer of a bill of lading, an effect which it certainly had not under the previous Factors Acts, and which it is apparent from another clause of the statute it could not have been intended that it should have, for clause 10 would be altogether superfluous if the view maintained by Inglis were sound. That clause declares that where a document of title has been transferred to a person as a buyer or owner of goods, and he transfers to a third party in good faith and for valuable consideration, the latter transfer shall have the same effect for defeating any vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu as if it were the transfer of a bill of lading. This clause, which first appeared in the Act of 1877, and is repeated in the Act of 1889, in no way altered the law as between the original vendor and vendee, but only affected the former's rights where the vendee has sold to a bona fide third party. But the important point here is, that it only partially removed the distinctive difference of effect between the transfer of bills of lading and other documents of title. But according to the view maintained by Inglis, a transfer of a delivery-order would operate to the full effect of a bill of lading, and section 10 would be re-enacting to a partial effect what had been already enacted in a more extended degree by section 3.

3. Assuming that the two questions dealt with were to be answered to an effect opposite to the views already expressed, would the diligence used by Robertson & Baxter be thereby excluded from effective operation? I do not think so. Without possession, constructive or actual, a pledge would not be a real security to the pledgee. What was done here, by whatever name called, would not confer possession, and so turn the warehouse-keeper into a holder for Inglis instead of a holder for Goldsmith. There being no intimation, the right was an incomplete right, or not an operative right to exclude an arrestment by a creditor of Goldsmith's in the hands of a holder who held for him, who had no intimation to cease to hold for him, and to hold for anyone else. To make his case good Inglis must shew that the legal effect of what was done was, under the Factors Acts, without any further procedure, to constitute a right in the goods in Scotland, not as against Goldsmith (A) merely, but absolutely against all persons having claims on which they could legally proceed to attach the goods there, so that the warehouse-keeper became divested of possession as for Goldsmith (A), or was invested with possession as for Inglis (B). It would seem that if this is to be the effect of the indorsation-over of the delivery-order, then such a document has become by the Factors Acts negotiable to an effect higher than it has ever had before without any direct words in the statute from which such an intention may be gathered. If this was intended, it would reasonably be expected that clear words of enactment would have been used. Particularly in view of the anomalous character of the change in the law which it is said to effect, I see no reason for holding, whatever may be the meaning of the clauses of the Factors Acts which are founded on, that they do indirectly, any more than directly, dispense with the step of intimation to the warehouse-keeper, necessary according to the previously existing law to make complete and real a right to goods obtained by contract, so as to exclude the operation of arrestment done by creditors of the party granting the right in the hands of the holder of the goods.

Along, therefore, with all the consulted Judges, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—The competition in this multiplepounding depends on the question whether or not, by the transaction of 18th December 1894, set forth in article 1 of the condescendence for the claimant Inglis, the whisky in dispute was pledged to him by the owner. If it was, his claim must be preferred to that of his only competitors, which rests on an arrestment used in February 1895 for a debt due to them by the pledgor. If it was not, his claim must be rejected, and that of his opponents sustained.

No. 139.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

The transaction took place in England between two domiciled Englishmen, Goldsmith, a merchant in London, and owner of the whisky, being the one, and the claimant Inglis the other. The question before us is, Did the transaction give Inglis a right of pledge in the whisky? And here the preliminary question arises, whether, in determining the rights which arise out of the transaction, we are to inquire into and apply the law of England as being the lex loci contractus, or that of Scotland as being the lex rei situs, the whisky having been arrested in Glasgow. This is the first, and, I think, the most important question raised by the record.

The second and only other question arises in the event of the first being answered to the effect that the lex loci contractus is immaterial, and that the rights which arise out of the transaction are to be determined according to the lex rei situs, and is, What, in that view, are these rights?

These questions we thought of sufficient general interest and importance to justify us in ordering written argument, and requesting the opinion of our learned brethren upon them.

The respondents (Robertson & Baxter) in their minute of debate say that the averment of their opponent Inglis with reference to the law of England "is irrelevant on account of its vagueness." So far as I recollect, there was no hint even of such a complaint when the case was before us. If there had been, and we had thought that there was any vagueness to complain of, we should have allowed, and indeed ordered, it to be corrected. To desire the opinion of the whole Court on such a matter would be somewhat ridiculous. I think the complaint is groundless.

The claimant Inglis' sole ground of claim is the right in the whisky which he took by this transaction between him and the owner. He has no other. If that right was a pledge and subsisted at the time of the arrestment by his competitors for a debt of the pledgor he must, I should think, prima facie at least, prevail, inasmuch as, by the law of Scotland, the creditors of the pledgor of goods can attach only the reversionary right of their debtor—(See Bell's Com. vol. ii. pp. 20-21). If at the date of the arrestment the whisky was not pledged to Inglis,—that is to say, completely and effectually pledged to him, for nothing less will serve,—the owner's right was entire. The validity of the arrestment to attach it, whether entire or reversionary, is not disputed. The reclamer's appeal to the law of England has no reference to the validity of the respondents' arrestment, but only to the extent, at the date of it, of their debtor's interest or estate in the whisky arrested.

I. By what law, then, is the dispute regarding Inglis' right arising out of the transaction in question to be determined? I think clearly by the law of England, the country where it was made, between two English merchants, who presumably—I should say certainly—had regard only to that law in expressing their intentions and doing what they knew or were advised was necessary to their accomplishment. The rule of our law on the subject is stated and explained by Erskine in his Institutes (b. 3, tit. 2, secs. 39 and 40). I quote only a short passage which immediately follows

No. 139. one to the effect that conveyances of land or property "which hath its fixed seat" in Scotland must be made and be interpreted according to the law of Scotland, "but in the case of a moveable subject lying in Scotland the deed of transmission, if perfected according to the lex domicilii, is effectual to carry the property; for moveables have no permanent situation, but may, at the pleasure of the proprietor, be brought from any other place to his own domicile, and therefore are considered as lying in that territory where the deed is signed, according to the rule mobilia sequuntur personam." Professor More deals with the same subject at the very beginning of his Notes on Stair's Institutes. I quote only two short passages. The first is in Note A (p. 1 of the Notes),—"Contracts are interpreted, and receive effect, in the Courts of Scotland according to the law of the place where they had their origin, and which the parties are presumed to have had in view. The evidence by which the contract is proved must be that which would be received in the place where it has been entered into." The second is at the foot of p. 2,—“As a corollary from the preceding doctrine it follows that all the consequences attached to the contract by the law of the state where it has been made ought to be admitted by any foreign Court in which the contract is sought to be enforced. Thus the interest exigible by the lex loci for any default in payment ought to be allowed in every country where the principles of international law are correctly understood. And accordingly this has been the rule adopted in Scotland. This, indeed, is a mere rule of construction, giving to the contract the meaning and operation which it is presumed the parties intended it should bear. And, on the same principle, it has been ruled that acts or proceedings which have taken place in a foreign country must be judged of, not according to the construction which such acts would have received had they taken place in Scotland, but according to that put on them by the law of the place where they occurred.”

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

The next authority which I cite is the case of the North-Western Bank v. Poynter.¹ In that case, as in this, the question was between two claimants in a Scotch multiplepounding brought by the holder of an arrested fund—the price of goods sold in Scotland. The goods had been previously pledged, and admittedly well pledged, by deposit of bill of lading, to the North-Western Bank of Liverpool by the owners Page & Company, who were Liverpool merchants. By a subsequent contract made in Liverpool between the bank (the pledgees) and Page & Company (the pledgors) the former handed back to the latter the bill of lading to enable them to sell the goods as agents for the bank, they undertaking to do so and to account to the bank for the price accordingly. They sold the goods to a Scotch buyer (Cross & Sons), in whose hands the price was arrested by creditors of theirs. The bank claimed the price as pledgees of the goods sold. The arresting creditors did not dispute the bank's claim if the pledge to them, admittedly well made, subsisted at the date of the arrestment, but maintained that it was annulled by their subsequent transaction with the pledgors on which the bill of lading was restored to them. The effect of this transaction on the rights of the parties to it was thus the question between the competing claimants in the Scotch multiplepinding. If it annulled the bank's pledge, Page & Company were thereafter absolute owners of the goods, and their creditors were entitled to attach them accordingly, or their price if sold, while if it did not, there was no answer to the bank's claim as pledgees. The transaction was in England between English parties, and the noble and learned Lords who decided the case were of opinion that the rights of parties under it must be determined according to the law of England. I refer to the judgments of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson quoted in the minute of debate for Mr Inglis. It would serve no purpose, on the question I am now dealing with, to notice the judgment of this Court, which proceeded on the opinion of a majority of the Judges on the transaction judged of according to Scotch law.

Inglis.

Now, this is certainly the latest authority on this subject, and is precisely in point and conclusive, unless on the question whether the lex loci contractus or lex rei situs shall predominate in the decision of a dispute upon a foreign transaction it is material whether the dispute regards the creation or the annulling of a pledge of goods.

I also refer to the judgment and opinion of Lord Rutherford in the case of Wallace v. Davies.¹ That was a case of unintimated assignation, and there may be grounds for distinguishing between such a case and that which we are now dealing with. Lord Rutherford was of opinion that the intimation to the debtor of an assignation of a debt or of goods to the custodier is, so far as the cedent's creditors are concerned, a mere form or ceremony. I concur in this opinion, and that for the reasons stated by his Lordship. Erskine, iii. 5, 3, explains the origin of this ceremony, and Professor Bell, 2 Com. pp. 18, 19, terms it "the ceremony of intimation." This truly idle ceremony may with respect to Scotch deeds be thought too inveterate to be dispensed with without legislation—though I hope otherwise—but to deny effect to foreign transactions in which it has not been observed by foreigners may well be thought another matter, and I agree with Lord Rutherford in thinking that it is. It is perhaps superfluous to say that a debtor or custodier of goods would not, according to a rule of law resting on substantial and reasonable considerations, be permitted to suffer any prejudice whatever by reason of an unintimated assignation. He has a right to be informed of an assignation, pledge, or anything relating to the debt he owes or the goods he holds, by which his interests may be affected or his conduct influenced. Creditors of the cedent have no such right, can take no benefit from intimation to the only person who has right to receive it, and suffer no prejudice from that person not receiving it. To require the observance of this ceremony by foreigners in foreign mercantile transactions is, I think, as unreasonable as it would be to require from them writing in a bargain about goods when the law and custom of their country where it is made does not require it, or that the writing shall be in a form and executed in a manner unknown in that country.

The respondents' argument on this question is very distinctly stated in their minute of debate, thus,—“It may be true that where a contract is made in England with reference to moveables in Scotland, the rights of the parties to the contract would fall to be determined by the law of England as the lex loci contractus, but where the party having right under the contract seeks to vindicate his right in and to the thing itself against third parties, then the question depends, not upon his contract, which affects only the contracting parties, but upon whether or not he has obtained a real right in the thing itself which he can vindicate against all the world. It is conceived that this question can only be determined by the lex situs. The personal rights of the various competing parties may depend upon contracts made or transactions taking place in different countries, and according to different laws, but when these parties seek to vindicate their rights in the subject, and to determine their preferences, they must, it is submitted, appeal to the law of the country in which the subject is situated to determine which of them is, or in what order of priority they are, in fact, vested with real rights in the subjects; and the law of that country when so appealed to can only give answer according to the rules and principles which it recognises and administers within its borders." I think this argument is unsound. It is indeed true that this contract (like all other contracts) immediately and directly affects only the parties to it. But how this bears on the question I do not see. Nor do I see how it can be of any significance in the contention that the right, which Inglis says, and desires, by reference to the law of England, to prove, that he takes under this contract, gives him a claim upon the fund in medio in this multiplepointing superior to that of his only competitor. The vast majority of claims in Scotch multiplepointings depend upon contracts or transactions; some depend on wills and legal succession. Is it a reasonable proposition that the lex loci contractus, the law of wills and of legal succession, which would otherwise govern the rights of the claimants, disappears because, and only because, they have an arresting creditor, or any number of arresting creditors, to compete with? The debt of the only arresting creditors here happens to be a Scotch judgment debt. Suppose it had been, as it might, a foreign debt, dependent on a foreign contract or transaction, is it even stateable that the lex loci contractus might not have been appealed to by them to support their claim, or by their opponents to defeat it?

In considering the question I am now dealing with, it is not, I think, safe or legitimate for us to conjecture what the law of England is,—that is to say, how we think that an English Court or English counsel would probably determine, or instruct us regarding, the rights arising out of the transaction in dispute. Lord Kincairney declines even to consider the question whether the law of England ought to be ascertained by us, being of opinion "that Inglis has made no relevant averments about the law of England," and that he is "therefore shut up to consider this case as depending on the law of Scotland." His Lordship must, I should think, regret this necessity, for after expressing a distinct opinion that if there was by the English transaction "a pledge of the delivery-order or warrant for the whisky by Goldsmith, it must be deemed to be a pledge of the whisky in terms of the Factors Act," he goes on to consider the question, "did the transaction amount to a pledge of the delivery-order," and says "I have considerable difficulty in understanding the agreement." But certainly the first step and first duty of the Court is to understand the agreement, and it is at least probable that the law and custom of the country where it was made may explain it or help to do so. Lord Low and Lord Kyllachy concur in the opinion that there was by the transaction no pledge of the document of title, or indication of intention to pledge. I cannot regard this as satisfactory, and indeed think it clear that we ought to be informed as to the import and meaning of the transaction according to the law and custom of the country where it was made. Nor can I assent to the view that the originally English Factors Act, 1889, having been subsequently extended to Scotland, we are presumably competent to judge of its provisions, and so to determine the effect of any of its clauses upon an English transaction. I think the proper and only safe course is to ascertain the law of England, and that not in the abstract but in the concrete,—that is to say, on the question what, according to that law, by statute or otherwise, are the rights arising to the parties out of the very transaction in question. Let us suppose that we shall ascertain, so as to be judicially satisfied, that by the transaction, according to the law of England, the document of title to the whisky was pledged, not by an executory contract, contracted to be pledged, but by an executed contract, actually pledged to Inglis, being deposited with him,—that is, delivered into his hands in security of the debt due to him by the owner of the whisky, and that the whisky itself was thereby pledged, the question would no doubt remain whether this was sufficient to support his claim in this multiplepinding. I doubt, though of course I am not sure, whether we should have ordered minutes of debate and consulted our brethren on that question, but I am sure, or at least nearly so, that if we had, the minutes of debate and also the opinions of our learned brethren would have been materially different from those now before us.

Suppose, on the contrary, that we shall be informed and judicially satisfied, as we possibly may be if we inquire, that Inglis' averment as to the law of England is unfounded, and that according to that law the transaction, on which alone he rests his claim, gives him no right of pledge either in the document of title or in the whisky—is it reasonably doubtful that this would put an end to his claim?

II. On the second question raised by the record, viz., what is the right arising to Inglis under the transaction in question according to the law of Scotland as the law of the situs of the whisky, I must take the facts to be as averred by Inglis and admitted by his opponents (Cond. 1 and Ans. 1). These facts, which indeed constitute the transaction, are in substance that Goldsmith, the owner, deposited the whisky with Inglis in security of a loan of £3000, in so far as a deposit could be lawfully effected by the written agreement of 18th December 1894, and the indorsement and delivery of the warehouse-keeper's delivery-order and warrant No. 18 of process. The loan is admitted, and also the contemporaneous fact that the "agreement of deposit" and the indorsed document of title were handed to the lender "when the loan was made." In short, it is the fact, admitted and agreed on, that on getting the money from the lender the borrower delivered to him in return the agreement and indorsed document of title to the whisky.

On these facts, and having regard to the terms of the agreement of deposit, and of the indorsed document of title which were handed to Inglis in

No. 139. return for his money, I am of opinion that the whisky was deposited with
Mar. 18, 1897. him on a contract of pledge. Pledge is a contract right, but the contract
Robertson & is not complete, or rather, I should say, is no contract of pledge without Baxter v. deposit of the thing pledged in the hands of the pledgee. A ship's cargo Inglis. or casks of whisky in a warehouse cannot without much labour, which in most cases would be superfluous, be handed over and deposited simply and actually as a watch or jewel may, and so, in the interest of trade, ways have been devised, and that without any remarkable ingenuity, of obtaining what may reasonably be called delivery or deposit of ship cargoes and warehoused goods without the actual physical or mechanical removal of them. The idea, looking only to the sense and reason of the thing, and disregarding mere ceremony, is so simple as this, that something shall be done sufficient to put the custodier (whether ship captain or warehouse-keeper) in the position of holding for the vendee or pledgee as he had theretofore done for the vendor or pledgor. Now, looking to the terms of the delivery-order and warrant of the custodiers here, which shews, and indeed really is, the contract with the pledgor (Goldsmith) on which they held the goods, it seems to me that after the indorsement and delivery of it to Inglis, the custodiers held for him exactly as they did for Goldsmith before and on the very same terms. Nor had they any choice in the matter.
They were bound by their contract to deliver the goods to Inglis as the indorsee and holder of their warrant, or to his order "by indorsement hereon," and could not without breach of contract deliver to any other. If there is any real difference or distinction in the relation between the custodiers and Inglis after the indorsement and delivery of the warrant, and that which previously existed between the cus-todiers and Goldsmith, I have not been able to perceive it. I think Goldsmith could not have demanded delivery from the Clyde Bonding Company (the custodiers) without production of their delivery-order and warrant. For they being by its terms bound to hold to "the order of W. C. Goldsmith or assigns by indorsement hereon" were certainly not in safety, and for that reason I think not bound, to deliver to anyone without its production or other satisfactory assurance that it could not thereafter be presented to them by a bona fide onerous indorsee. I cannot doubt that it was thus expressed with the intention and purpose of giving anyone to whom in the ordinary course of business it was indorsed and delivered assurance that the Clyde Bonding Company had undertaken and were bound to hold for him under that contract exactly as if it had been made with him. This seems a reasonable meaning to attach to it, and no other occurs to me. If it had been expressed thus,—“By the contract which we (the Clyde Bonding Company) hereby make with W. C. Goldsmith, we, at his request, undertake to hold the whisky, on the condition specified hereon, for any person who is the holder hereof indorsed by the said W. C. Goldsmith,” I could not doubt that this would, without the necessity of any ceremony, have imported a contract between the Clyde Bonding Company and Inglis or any other to whom the document expressing it was duly indorsed and delivered. I think the contract as it stands amounts to this, and if so, then at the date of the arrestment by Robertson & Baxter, in the hands of the Clyde Bonding Company, Inglis was the lawful holder and transferee of the contract on which they held the whisky, and as such entitled to demand implement by delivery. It is, I think, clear that neither the Clyde Bonding Company nor Goldsmith could have declined to recognise his right or lawfully done anything to frustrate it. No. 139.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

On these grounds I am of opinion that Inglis' claim is good at the common law, irrespective of the Factors Act.

On that Act also I think it is good. The important section is the third, and it is remarkable, and regrettable, that there should be such variety of judicial opinion, as this case has elicited, regarding its meaning and practical effect. Without any avoidable criticism of the opinions of others, I will state my own briefly :—(First) I agree with those of my brethren who think that the provision of the section is not limited to factors or mercantile agents. I am unable to accept the view that the Legislature intended to empower any owner of goods to pledge them by pledging the document of title, provided he was careful to avoid doing it himself, and authorised an agent to do it for him. (Second) I concur in the opinion of, I think, the majority of my brethren, that the delivery-order and warrant of the Clyde Bonding Company is a document of title within the meaning of the Act. (Third) I agree with Lord Kincairney and any others who think—I quote from his Lordship's opinion,—“that if there was a pledge of the delivery-order or warrant for the whisky by Goldsmith, it must be deemed to be a pledge of the whisky in the sense of the Factors Act.” (Fourth) I am of opinion that this document was pledged by Goldsmith to Inglis on 18th December 1894. For the exact facts, as I take them to be established by admission, and not really in dispute, I refer to what I have already said. On these facts I hold that the document of title in question was deposited with Inglis to be held by him in security of his loan to Goldsmith. It is of course true that the intention and purpose with which anything is delivered by the owner to another must, if disputed, be shewn somehow, and that satisfactorily. I did not really understand that the intention and purpose with which this document of title was delivered to Inglis was disputed, the only dispute being, as I thought, of a quite other character, viz., whether the admitted intention and purpose of pledge by a borrower to a lender could with respect to warehoused goods be effected without the ceremony of intimation. But assuming that there is such dispute, and that the intention and purpose of the certainly admitted deposit of this document of title with Inglis must be proved to our satisfaction, I venture to ask whether there is room for reasonable doubt as to the matter of fact. Inglis says it was as a pledge to him in security of the loan he admittedly then and there made to the depositor. This is consistent with the agreement of deposit (though that specifies only the whisky), and with the admission given by his opponents in their answer already referred to, and no other account of it or reason for it is suggested. Lord M'Laren says that a pledge of the document of title would be a pledge of only the paper on which it is written, which was probably not intended. I cannot assent to this, for a right to hold and retain from the owner a deed or document written on paper may be more valuable as a security for debt than the paper. I do, however, agree that, irrespective of the clause in the Act which I am considering, a pledge of a document of title would not pledge goods. But how this bears on the question before us I fail to see. That question is only this, Was there a pledge of the document of title? If there was not, there was of course no pledge of it either as paper or as document. If there was, then there was by the statute a pledge of the goods. To this I can see no answer.

I may call attention to section 11 of the Act 1889 (one of the supplemental clauses) regarding the "transfer of a document." I think the "transfer" of the document to Inglis was so complete as to need no support from this clause, though it may be referred to as removing any doubt which ingenuity may suggest.

I have said that I should abstain from any avoidable criticisms of the opinions of my learned brethren in which I do not concur. I must, however, state my views regarding the case of M'Ewan v. Smith,¹ which is referred to by some of the consulted Judges as supporting the proposition that a pledge or assignation of warehoused goods cannot be made so as to be effectual in competition with an arresting creditor of the pledgor or cedent without intimation to the warehouse-keeper, and by others as supporting the proposition that section 4 of the Factors Act, 1842, and consequently section 3 of the Factors Act, 1889, has no application to principals. I need hardly say that had I taken either of these views of the decision of the House of Lords I should not have formed, certainly not expressed, the opinion which I have now stated, and it is not without diffidence and a careful consideration of the decision as reported that I presume to differ from, I think, all my brethren as to its import. The substantial question in the case was whether on the facts an unpaid vendor retained or had lost his lien on the goods, which at the date of sale were in a bonded warehouse, and were still there when the vendee became bankrupt. There was no warehouse-keeper's certificate or warrant, but only an entry in the warehouse books under the title "James Alexander for J. & A. Smith." J. & A. Smith were the vendors whose lien was in dispute, and Alexander their importing agent. Their vendees were Bowie & Company, who became bankrupt without payment of the price. At the time of the sale Bowie & Company received from J. & A. Smith a letter addressed by them to Alexander desiring him to deliver the goods to their (Bowie & Company's) order. They never received any other document from them. Bowie & Company then sold the goods to M'Ewan & Company, handing to them in return for the price the letter from J. & A. Smith to Alexander, indorsed thus—"Deliver to the order of William M'Ewan, Sons, & Co.—James Bowie & Co." The first sellers were not informed of this subsale until after Bowie & Company's bankruptcy.

These are, I think, the whole material facts, and certainly those on which the judgment of the House of Lords proceeded. The noble and learned Lords were unanimously of opinion, and decided—first, that J. & A. Smith's letter to Alexander, and the handing of it to Bowie & Company, was no hindrance whatever to their lien for the unpaid price; second, that it did not become such hindrance by being indorsed and handed by Bowie & Company to the subvendees M'Ewan & Company ; and third, that J. & A. Smith had done nothing in respect of which they ought, on equitable considerations, to be estopped from maintaining and exercising their lien.

Robertson &
Baxter v.
Ingliis.

It is only in the view that J. & A. Smith's letter to their agent Alexander was a document of title within the meaning of the Acts of 1842, 1889, and 1893—the meaning is the same in all of them—that the case of *M'Ewan v. Smith*¹ can be intelligently referred to for any purpose here. But is this view stateable? Let me, by supposition, change the facts by substituting for that letter a delivery-order and warrant by the warehouse-keeper to the order of J. & A. Smith, in the same terms as that held by Ingliis, duly indorsed and delivered to Bowie & Co. and by them to M'Ewan & Co., is it reasonably certain, or even conceivable, that the judgment and the reasons for it would have been the same? The House of Lords had no occasion to deal with the question whether section 4 of the Factors Act, 1842, applied to principals holding documents of title, and no allusion whatever, direct or indirect, is made to it by any of the noble Lords. Then with respect to the non-intimation to the warehouse-keeper of the letter to Alexander, I collect from the opinions of all the noble Lords that no intimation would have affected the judgment. The Lord Chancellor says with respect to Alexander, that "being the agent for the vendors, and the goods being in the warehouse of Messrs Little & Co., he could only have acted under the authority of the original delivery-note of the vendors, and all he could have done under it would have been to give directions to the warehouseman to deliver the goods." Lord Campbell says substantially the same, adding emphatically that Alexander was not at liberty to give such directions or authority to the warehouse-keeper to deliver the goods or transfer them to the name of the purchaser except upon payment of the price.

I have been struck with the aversion manifested, and indeed strongly expressed, by my brethren, to regard bills of lading as of the same character and on the same level as the other "documents of title to goods" specified in the Factors Acts of 1842 and 1889, and the Sale of Goods Act of 1893. I must own, though with becoming diffidence, that I cannot see any distinction or reason for any. A bill of lading is a contract of carriage involving custody usually of goods in bulk, and it was found to be convenient, and therefore expedient, in the interests of commerce, that the possession of the bill of lading should be taken as proof of the possession or control of the goods. There was for a long time serious difference of legal opinion and conflicting and indeed diametrically opposite decisions on the subject, but at last, and after juries had returned verdicts finding that such was the usage of merchants, it was determined by the House of Lords that bills of lading should be regarded as negotiable to the effect of transmitting property whether absolutely as by sale, or specially as by pledge, by their indorsation and delivery.

Again, a "warehouse-keeper's certificate and warrant or order for the delivery of goods" is a contract of custody with an obligation on the custodian very similar, I should say, to that imposed by a bill of lading, and, or an agent on his behalf to some other person than the original buyer. In such case the person buying or advancing money on the pledge of the goods or documents of title, without knowledge of the previous sale, is not affected by the previous sale, but is regarded as having acquired his right from one expressly authorised to confer it. Section 9 deals with the case of a person who has bought or agreed to buy goods, and who, with consent of the seller, obtains possession of the goods or the documents of title; and it is provided that any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods or documents of title by such person, or any agent on his behalf, shall prevail against any lien or other right competent to the original seller. The one section deals with the converse of the case presented in the other. Section 8 provides for the case of a seller acting to the prejudice of the buyer; section 9 provides for the case of a buyer acting to the prejudice of the seller. But neither of the cases so provided for is the case here. Goldsmith has done nothing to defeat the right of Inglis, and Inglis has done nothing to prejudice Goldsmith. The question before us is, whether Inglis' title to the whisky, as complete (or incomplete) now as when it was granted, is preferable or not to a right in Robertson & Baxter, not based upon any transference or other title conferred by or flowing from Goldsmith, but based upon a decree and diligence which they have obtained and used without the consent of Goldsmith at all. The cases are so essentially different that I cannot understand the reference to sections 8 and 9 of the Factors Act as bearing upon the case or supporting the claim of Mr Inglis.

The only other clause in the Factors Act which is relied on by Inglis is the third, and it is, in my opinion, the only clause which gives even the semblance of support to his case. It provides that "a pledge of the document of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods." It is maintained that that clause means that in every case the pledge of documents of title, whether by owner or mercantile agent entrusted by the owner, shall be the same in all respects and to all effects as actual corporeal delivery of the goods themselves. If that is the meaning and effect of the clause, then cadit questio. If the goods were actually delivered to Inglis in December 1894, and remained in his possession or the possession of someone on his behalf, they could not be attached by the arrestment of Robertson & Baxter in February 1895, and if not so arrested, Baxter & Robertson have no claim. Is that the meaning of the clause? I think not.

I think the clause cannot be dissociated from its context, and in speaking of the context I disregard altogether the cross heading "disposition by mercantile agents" and the marginal rubrics. By context I mean the clause which precedes and the clauses which follow the one under consideration. Clause 2 and clauses 4, 5, and 6 have reference to transactions entered into and things done by a mercantile agent, and their effect on his principal. Why, then, should section 3 be read as expressing an abstract rule of law, affecting all transactions or contracts of pledge, apart from every connection therewith of a mercantile agent? To do so is to introduce into the Act a provision foreign to its main purpose. I think the clause may reasonably be read, in view of the context, as a provision merely that a pledge by a mercantile agent of documents of title shall in any question with his princial be deemed to be a pledge of the goods to which the documents refer. Is it anything more than a proviso qualifying sections 2 and 4? No. 139.

But assuming that the clause refers to transactions between principals as well as between a principal and one who is only an agent (for what an agent may do cannot be said to be beyond the power of the principal) the clause in question does not necessarily bear the interpretation put upon it by Mr Inglis. Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

The word "pledge" may either mean the thing pledged or the contract under which it is given or to be given by the owner to the pledgee. In clause 2 I think it means the contract, not the thing. This is quite in consonance with the interpretation clause, section 1, subsection 5, which says that the word "pledge" shall include "any contract pledging," and it seems to me to give a full meaning to the clause to read it as providing that a contract to pledge documents of title entered into by an agent or by a principal shall be as effectual as a contract to pledge the goods to which the documents refer. But a contract to pledge would only confer a jus ad rem, not a jus in re.

I abstain from further observations on this 3d clause of the Factors Act, because I cannot usefully add anything to what has been said thereon by Lord Kyllachy and Lord Low, in whose opinions generally I concur.

I think the interlocutor reclaimed against should be affirmed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the consulted Judges and the majority of your Lordships.

1. The claimant Inglis maintains that the question raised falls to be decided according to the law of England. If the law of England applied it would require to be ascertained in the usual way. I am of opinion, however, that the law of Scotland, which is the lex situs as well as the lex fori, applies, the question being one, not as to the constitution of the contract between Goldsmith and Inglis, but as to a competition of alleged real rights in moveables locally situated in Scotland. The balance of authority is in favour of this view. It is established by a series of decisions in our own Courts (Strachan v. M'Dougle,¹ Ord v. Donaldson,² Connal & Co. v. Loder ³), and is in accordance with a large body of authority in the writings of jurists.

If, then, the case falls to be decided according to the law of Scotland, there is, I think, no doubt that by that law (apart from the Factors Acts) the arresting creditors, the claimants Robertson & Baxter, must be preferred. Pledge being a real right requires for its completion delivery of the goods pledged or equivalents for delivery; and where the goods are in possession of a third party, the mere transfer to the pledgee of a delivery-order or warrant is not of itself sufficient, without intimation to the custodian, to complete the pledgee's right. At common law a delivery-order is not equivalent to a bill of lading—M'Ewan v. Smith,⁴ and it makes no difference that the order or warrant transferred bears, as here, that the goods are held to the order of the pledgor or his assignees by indorsement—Connal & Co. v. Loder.⁵ The law of England seems to be the same—Farina v. Home,⁶ Benjamin on Sale, 4th edn. 829.

 Robertson &
 Baxter v.
 Inglis.

2. A more difficult question is raised under the Factors Acts and the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The reclaimer relies in particular upon the 3d, 8th, 9th, and 10th sections of the Factors Act, 1889, made applicable to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890, and sections 25 and 47 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which, with certain amplifications, embody almost verbatim the 8th, 9th, and 10th sections of the Factors Act, 1889.

(1) I shall deal first with the 8th, 9th, and 10th sections of the Factors Act, 1889. The answer to the reclaimer's argument on these clauses seems to me to be that in this case there is no room for their application; but they may be referred to as throwing light upon the rest of the argument on the Factors Acts. They deal solely with title to transfer, and implied authority to pledge or sell, possessed by a person entrusted as agent or quasi-agent with goods or documents of title. Here there is no question of ostensible ownership or ostensible authority to transfer—there is no agent or quasi-agent. There are only the two immediate parties to the contract, Goldsmith and Inglis. No one is claiming through Inglis; he has not transferred the delivery-order to a sub-purchaser; he is claiming on it himself. Again, Goldsmith is not in the position of the person entrusted; there is no dispute that when he agreed to pledge the goods to Inglis he had full right of property in the goods, and full right to dispose of them as he pleased. It is an accident that the arresting creditors Robertson & Baxter happened to have sold the whisky in question to Goldsmith. They have not, and do not profess to have, any right in or against the goods as sellers; and as far as regards the present question they are simply creditors of Goldsmith, using their rights as such to attach his property in satisfaction of his debt to them.

This being the state of the facts, it will be seen that sections 8 and 9 do not in terms apply. The 8th section deals with the case of the seller being left by the purchaser in possession of the goods or documents of title, and thereafter selling or pledging them to another person. The 9th section applies to the case of a purchaser who with consent of the seller obtains possession of the goods or documents of title and transfers them to a sub-purchaser. The effect of these sections—and be it noted that it required express enactment to produce it—is to place a seller or first purchaser in the same position as a mercantile agent for the true owner, and to give to transferences of the goods or documents of title by them to a third party, taking in good faith, the same effect as the previous Factors Acts attributed to a transference by a mercantile agent. Here we have neither of these cases.

Neither does the 10th section touch the question. Inglis has not transferred the delivery-order to a sub-purchaser; and even if Robertson & Baxter could be regarded as the “unpaid sellers,” they are not seeking to avail themselves of any right of lien or stoppage in transitu or any other right as sellers. They have been completely divested, and are claiming merely as creditors.

But further, even if the question had arisen with a purchaser from Inglis, or if Robertson & Baxter were held to be the sellers, and Goldsmith the person interested, I am of opinion that the effect of the clauses to which I have referred would have been, not to complete a real right in the sub-purchaser, but to deprive the seller or sellers of any right of lien or other similar right in the goods which he or they had as such. No. 139.

It is not necessary to examine in detail the 25th and 47th sections of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, because those clauses simply embody the 8th, 9th, and 10th sections of the Factors Act of 1889. But it may be noted that in the code of which they now form part it is more than once declared that the rules of the common law are not affected, "save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act"; and by section 61 (4) it is provided—"The provisions of this Act relating to contracts of sale do not apply to any transaction in the form of a contract of sale which is intended to operate by way of mortgage, pledge, charge, or other security." Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglist.

If the law of pledge has been altered by any of the clauses referred to, this has been done not directly but by inference. There is every presumption against such a radical change having been effected in this way, and I cannot point to a stronger illustration than one which is furnished by the Factors Acts themselves. It was found that under the earlier Factors Acts a sale or pledge by a mercantile agent entrusted with goods or documents of title was effectual, while a sale or pledge by a vendee similarly entrusted was not. The Courts of law did not feel themselves entitled to infer from the powers conferred by the statutes on a mercantile agent that a vendee entrusted with the goods or documents of title had equal powers to bind the vendor, and it required the Factors Acts of 1877 and 1889 to effect this change. When it was effected, it will be observed that it was made with an amount of caution and detail which would have been quite unnecessary if it had been intended that the indorsation of a delivery-order should be equivalent to delivery of the goods themselves, and this brings me to the consideration of the remaining statutory provision upon which the reclaimer founds.

(2) Reliance is placed by the reclaimer upon the 3d section of the Factors Act, 1889, which enacts,—“A pledge of the documents of title to goods shall be deemed to be a pledge of the goods.” This, it is said, is an unqualified declaration of general application that a pledge of documents of title shall be equivalent to a pledge of the goods completed by delivery.

Strictly speaking, the agreement of deposit or hypothecation by Goldsmith to Inglist is not a pledge of a document of title; it is a very good example of what the statute calls “a pledge of the goods” themselves, but which really is only, to use the words of the statutory definition of “pledge” (section 1 (5)), “a contract pledging or giving a lien or security over goods.” The words are, “in consideration of your advancing to me the sum of £3000, I hereby deposit with you, having full power and authority to do so, the wines and spirits specified in the schedule hereto as a security for the payment of the said £3000,” &c. The delivery-order was indorsed and transferred in order to make this agreement effectual to Inglist. I do not find in any of the statutes a provision that an agreement to pledge goods shall be equivalent to delivery of the goods. It would be strange if, while in this sense a pledge of the goods is not equivalent to delivery of them, a pledge of the documents of title should have that effect. And therefore,

No. 139. even taking this transaction as a pledge of the delivery-order, I am satisfied that the true effect of the section relied on is simply to define the scope of a mercantile agent's power to contract so as to bind his principal. This is the view which, at least in Scotland, has for upwards of fifty years been taken of that provision as it stood in the 4th section of the Factors Act of 1842.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglis.

The enactment must be interpreted and judged by its setting and by its origin. The heading of the group of clauses in which section 3 occurs is, "dispositions by mercantile agents." This may not, taken by itself, be of importance; but what is of importance is that section 3 occurs in the middle of what are termed the agency clauses. And this is what might have been expected, seeing that the clause is taken from the 4th section of the Factors Act, 1842. That Act is confined to the law relating to advances made to agents entrusted with goods. The 4th section deserves examination. It is an interpretation clause; it begins with defining the term "document of title," and speaks of the various documents therein enumerated as affording proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising by indorsement or delivery the possessor of such document to transfer the goods. It next states the circumstances in which an agent shall be held to have been entrusted with the possession of goods represented by such document of title; and then come the words from which the 3d section of the Factors Act of 1889 is taken—"all contracts pledging or giving a lien upon such document of title as aforesaid shall be taken and deemed to be respectively pledges of and liens upon the goods to which the same relates." Any difficulty which might have been created by the omission of the words "all contracts" from the 3d section of the Act of 1889 is removed by the definition of the word "pledge" in that statute, to which I have already referred.

The meaning of these provisions as I read them simply is, that if the owner of goods entrusts his agent with the documents of title, any person advancing money to the agent on the faith of them shall be entitled to assume that the agent is in possession of or has control of the goods with the knowledge and consent of the owner, and if the agent pledges the documents of title in security of an advance, it shall be held, as in a question between the pledgee and the owner of the goods, that the agent is empowered to enter, and has entered, into a contract pledging the goods. But I do not read them as meaning that the goods shall thereby be held to have been delivered to the pledgee; they relate to power to contract, and not to the completion of real rights. In this connection I would point out that the case Farina v. Home,¹ to which I have already referred, was decided subsequently to the passing of the Factors Act, 1842. In that case it was decided that until the wharfinger attorned to the holder of the warrant there was no constructive delivery to him. And in speaking of such documents of title Mr Benjamin says (4th ed. p. 829),—"In the decided cases between vendor and vendee the Judges construe these documents as mere tokens of authority to receive possession, as mere offers by the warehouseman to hold the goods for the indorsee of the warrant, inchoate and incomplete till the vendee has obtained the warehouseman's consent to attorn to him." This is in accordance with the Scottish decisions of M'Ewan v. Smith,¹ decided in 1849, and the later case of Connal v. Loder.² No. 139.

I have hitherto spoken of the 3d section as if it related only to dispositions by mercantile agents, but even if it is held to apply to dispositions by sellers and buyers of goods (which perhaps it does), I do not think that the question is altered, because the effect of sections 8, 9, and 10 is simply to place sellers and buyers in the cases mentioned in the same position as mercantile agents for the true owner. Robertson &
Baxter v.
Inglist.

It may be, although I do not think so, that it was intended by the enactments on which the reclaimer relies, to place delivery-orders and warehouse warrants in the same position to all intents and purposes as bills of lading, and in particular to enact that, in order to the completion of the real right of pledge, it should not be necessary to intimate to the warehouse-keeper the transfer of such documents of title. But in my opinion this has not been effected by any of the statutory provisions in question.

On the whole case, I think that the Lord Ordinary has rightly sustained the claim of Robertson & Baxter, and that his interlocutor should be affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the cause, with the opinions of the consulted Judges, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the whole Judges of the Court, refuse the reclaiming note against the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy, dated 20th March 1896: Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern: Find the claimants and respondents Messrs Robertson & Baxter entitled to additional expenses, and remit," &c.

No. 140. enacts that, when a candidate's return of election expenses contains some error, if the candidate applies to the Court and shews that such error has arisen, inter alia, by reason of inadvertence, or of any reasonable excuse of a like nature, "and not by reason of any want of good faith" on his part, the Court may allow an authorised excuse for the same. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that it is competent for a person opposing a petition by a candidate for an authorised excuse for certain errors in his return of election expenses to lead evidence of other errors in the return, with the view of shewing that those specified were not due to mere inadvertence.

Process—Expenses—Reclaiming Note on merits and expenses—Time for objecting to Lord Ordinary's award.—When a party reclaiming objects to an interlocutor not only as wrong on the merits but also as wrong in finding the claimer liable in expenses, even if right on the merits, he must state his objection as to expenses in opening on the reclaiming note.

1st DIVISION. (SEQUEL of Clark v. Sutherland, Dec. 2, 1896, supra, p. 183.)
Ld. Kyllachy.

On 2d December the Court remitted the case to Lord Kyllachy to proceed as might be just. After the interlocutor the respondent Mackinnon took no part in the proceedings. On 10th December the Lord Ordinary allowed a proof before answer.

On 5th January 1897, before the proof was taken, the petitioner craved leave to make an addition to the prayer (arts. 6 and 7).

The respondent objected, but the Lord Ordinary allowed the amendment, reserving all questions of relevancy.

The prayer, as then amended, was as follows:—"To make an order for allowing an authorised excuse for the petitioner's failure (1) to transmit the return of his election expenses within the time fixed by the Statute 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 51, section 33; (2) to enclose as part of said return the receipt for £2, 2s. paid by the petitioner to the Lybster Temperance Hall Committee; (3) to enclose as part of said return the receipt for £5, 15s. paid by the petitioner to James Nicol, Wick; (4) to insert the date of the election in the return which he made; (5) to state accurately the christian name of the said James Nicol in the said return; (6) to insert the date of the election in the declaration as to the petitioner's expenses; and (7) to insert in the said declaration the amount paid by him for the purpose of the said election or for his failure to do any of the above wherein your Lordships shall consider that the petitioner has not complied with the statute; and further, to make an order allowing all or any of the above failures or omissions, if found to have been committed, to be an exception or exceptions from the provisions of the said Act, which would otherwise make the same an illegal practice."

In the course of the proof counsel for the respondent Sutherland proposed to put the following question to the petitioner in cross-examination:—" (Q.) In the summary of election expenses, No. 16 of process, all the personal expenses you have put down are £2, 2s. 6d. ?" This question was objected to by counsel for the petitioner, "in respect that the object of the question is to discover further errors and omissions in the account, which are not in this petition sought to be excused." Counsel for the respondent contended that he was entitled to put such questions to the witness for the purpose of shewing that in his return he wilfully, or with gross carelessness, understated the amount of his personal expenses. The Lord Ordinary sustained the objection.

At a later stage in the proof counsel for the respondent Sutherland further proposed to tender a witness "to prove from the books of the Royal Hotel, Thurso, that charges for hiring in connection with the election were incurred by Dr Clark, and not included in his election account." Counsel for the petitioner objected, on the ground that the proposed inquiry was not within the petition. The Lord Ordinary sustained the objection. No. 140.

Clark v.
Sutherland.

On 14th January 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds (1) that the petitioner does not insist in that part of the prayer of the petition which prays for an authorised excuse for the failure first mentioned in the prayer, except in so far as such failure may be held to be constituted by the omissions or errors second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh mentioned in said prayer: Finds (2) that the said errors or omissions second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh mentioned in said prayer arose by reason of inadvertence, and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the petitioner: Finds (3) that in these circumstances the petitioner is entitled to an order for an authorised excuse in terms of the 34th section of the statute: Therefore excuses the said errors or omissions, in terms of said section, and also excuses the petitioner's failure to transmit the return and declaration respecting his election expenses, as required by the statute, in so far as the said errors or omissions imported, or may be held to import, such failure so to transmit: To the above extent and effect grants the prayer of the petition: Quoad ultra dismisses the same: Finds no expenses due to or by either party, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—Having considered the proof, I see no reason for refusing the petitioner the order which he seeks for an authorised excuse for the errors and omissions set forth in the prayer of the petition. The excuse suggested, and which I propose to affirm, is that these errors and omissions arose by reason of inadvertence, and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the petitioner.

"I do not think that it is necessary to attempt to define abstractly the meaning of the term 'inadvertence' as used in the statute. I am not sure that the term can be better paraphrased than by saying (in the words of one of the English Judges) that inadvertence is just negligence or carelessness where the circumstances shew an absence of bad faith. There may, of course, be degrees of carelessness, and perhaps in this case the degree was considerable. But it was not, I think, the intention of the Legislature that the Court should grant or refuse an order for an excuse according to what might happen to be their estimate of the degree of inadvertence. Bad faith is of course another matter, and it may be that a deliberate and open defiance of the statute would have that character. It has been said that a late eminent legislator used to declare that he would undertake to drive a coach and six through any Act of Parliament that might be passed, and if it appeared that the petitioner had acted in that spirit or with that motive, I do not say that he could have been excused. But I have hardly, I think, to deal with a case of that description.

"There are just two points which I should perhaps notice. The respondents seem to suggest that the petitioner had committed other and similar irregularities for which an excuse was not sought. I refused to allow evidence as to these, because I thought, and still think, that I have only here to deal with the specific errors and omissions for which an excuse is sought. It did not appear that the irregularities in question were connected with those covered by the petition, or that (for that reason or otherwise) their investigation was likely to throw light upon the subject-matter of the petition.

"The other point is this: The petitioner asks to have an excuse under

No. 140. The respondent reclaimed, inter alia, on the ground that the Lord Ordinary had erred in sustaining the objections to the question put to the petitioner in cross-examination, and to the evidence which he had proposed to lead.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the rulings of the Lord Ordinary cannot be sustained.

The first question put was to Dr Clark, the petitioner, himself. He was asked,—“In the summary of election expenses all the personal expenses you have put down are £2, 2s. 6d.?” That was a very innocent question, but it was indicative, and was avowed to be indicative, of what was to follow, and that was that questions were to be put tending to shew that more personal expenses had been incurred than the sum which was put down. The objection was this,—“Objected to by counsel for petitioner, in respect that the object of the question is to discover further errors and omissions in the account, which are not in this petition sought to be excused. Counsel for the respondent Sutherland contended that he was entitled to put such questions to witness for the purpose of shewing that in his return he wilfully, or with gross carelessness, understated the amount of his personal expenses,” and the Lord Ordinary sustained the objection. I think that was a bad objection. The petitioner in an application of this kind cannot, by limiting his application to certain omissions, limit the inquiry as to his conduct to these particulars, because the Act of Parliament says that what he has to make out in regard to the omissions sought to be excused is that they were occasioned by inadvertence—which is the allegation here—and not by any want of good faith. Suppose it should appear that the petitioner, over and above the omissions which he seeks to be the 34th section of the statute,* that being the section which deals specially with errors or omissions in connection with the return of election expenses. He also, however, asks for an order under the 23d section of the statute,† which section deals generally, inter alia, with all acts or omissions of a candidate at any election, which, by reason of being in contravention of the provisions of the Act, ‘would be, but for that section, an illegal practice, payment, employment, or hiring.’

“I do not know the precise object for which the double order so sought is desired. It perhaps has to do with a certain difference in the language of the two sections—the 23d section providing that the Court shall make an order allowing an ‘exception from the provisions of the Act,’ and the 34th section providing for an order for allowing an ‘authorised excuse.’ It seems to me, however, that what the statute contemplated, in the particular case with which we have here to deal, was that the order should be an order under the 34th section, and that that order should be sufficient. Indeed I doubt whether, upon a strict construction of the words of the 23d section, an order under that section would be competent. For the exception there authorised is confined to the case where, but for that section, the omission would be an illegal practice. And that cannot, I apprehend, be predicated of errors or omissions with respect to the return of election expenses, seeing that by section 33, subsection 6, such errors or omissions constitute illegal practices only if and when they are without an ‘authorised excuse,’—that is to say, an excuse under section 34. For these reasons I have dismissed that part of the prayer of the petition which asks for an exception under section 23.”

excused from, has wholesale omitted other items which were proper to the heads of his account, would that not bear on the question whether a particular omission was to be excused, whether particular omissions were inadvertent or not, and also on the question whether the omissions were in good faith? In like manner, even one additional omission might, from its character or circumstances, be strong evidence of want of good faith; and in questions of conduct it is impossible to shut out evidence of the animus which actuates proceedings of which, by accident, only part are directly under consideration. It seems to me, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary has mistaken the scope of the proof, which it is part of the petitioner's case to offer to the Court,—proof, namely, of inadvertence and of the presence of good faith. To my thinking, the question objected to is highly relevant to the inquiry, and the same observation applies to the second question which was objected to, the objection being again sustained.

No. 140.
Mar. 18, 1897.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

The same reasoning leads me to a like conclusion in regard to the evidence tendered of expense having been incurred for hiring and not included in the return.

With reference to what Mr Ure said as to the distinction to be drawn between the cross-examination of the party to the cause on a particular topic and substantive evidence being led on the same subject, there is no doubt that such a distinction is recognised. But it does not occur when the subject-matter of the inquiry is relevant to the issue, and, as I have already said, evidence of this character seems to me to be completely relevant on the question of inadvertence and good faith. The cases to which Mr Ure refers are cases where the party to the cause may be cross-examined on matters not bearing on the issue with a view to testing his character and credibility. But here the vital point is that the evidence was relevant to the cause. I am therefore of opinion that these objections ought not to be sustained, and that the case should go back to the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT found that the objections set forth in the proof ought not to have been sustained: Therefore recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against; repelled the objections; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as should be just.

Additional proof was led. At the close of the discussion on the evidence, the petitioner moved for leave to make the following amendment:—“(First) By inserting the following statement:—‘At the time when the petitioner transmitted the said return he had completely forgotten that he had incurred a hiring account to Henderson's Royal Hotel, Thurso, during his candidature. The account had not been sent in to the petitioner, and he had not paid it. The account, which amounted to £2, 9s., was sent in about November 1895 to Surgeon-General M'Lean, a supporter of the petitioner at Thurso, with whom the petitioner was residing at the time when the said account was incurred. Surgeon-General M'Lean sent it to Mrs Clark, who paid it with her own cheque, not knowing that it was an expense connected with the petitioner's election. The petitioner was at that time in India, and did not know till his return home, in or about March 1896, that his wife had paid the said account for him. He was

No. 140. not informed that the account which had been paid was one in connection with his election, and did not know that it was so until after the 5th January 1897, when the said account was referred to by the respondent Sutherland at the previous diet of proof in this petition. The petitioner omitted to mention the said account in his return through pure inadvertence, and he had no intention whatever of not returning any expense he had incurred.' (Second) . . . (Third) To insert in the prayer of the petition, between the words 'said election' and the words 'or for his failure,' the following words:—'(8) To include as an unpaid claim in the return of his election expenses the sum of £2, 9s., incurred to Henderson's Royal Hotel, Thurso'; and (Fourth) to omit the first head of the prayer of the petition."

Mar. 18, 1897.
Sutherland.

The result of the whole evidence led was that the averments of the petitioner were substantially proved. With reference to his personal expenses, the petitioner deposed that these amounted to £2, 2s. 6d., and that he "was very rarely in hotels in the county, as the leading people were always desirous of my living with them."

With regard to the omission of the amount of the election expenses from the declaration, the petitioner deposed,—“My attention has been called to the fact that in the declaration there have been omitted the date of the election and the amount of the election expenses. I do not remember at present when my attention was first called to that. In the Sheriff-clerk's letter of 4th September 1895 he says in the last paragraph, 'I may point out that several blanks, both in the return and in the declaration, were not filled up, and in this way they are both incomplete.' So far as I remember, I received no further information than that with regard to the blanks in the return or declaration. . . . The Sheriff-clerk printed an abstract of the election expenses in the usual way. I saw it in the newspapers. I accordingly believed that the return and declaration were quite in order. The Sheriff-clerk in his letter said that he had printed the ordinary statutory summary of my return of election expenses, and I thought he was perfectly satisfied then with the return. I thought that if the return had not been within the period I would have required to make another, but when the Sheriff-clerk published the abstract I thought the Sheriff and himself had accepted it. I was not aware at the time that I had left two blanks in the declaration unfilled up. (Q.) Was it by inadvertence that you so left them? (A.) Entirely. . . . I did not know at the time when sending it off that I had left those blanks. It was the last page, and on looking over it I struck out the phrase 'by my election agent,' but I did not notice there were two blanks to be filled up. There was no bad faith in the matter. I did not intend to do anything that was wrong. I intended to fill it up in the usual way. It was merely a formal thing to be done. I was giving more attention to the return, in order that everything might be accurate as to the money expended, and the return does contain the sum. It was signed at the same time as the declaration. Cross.—. . . I had acted as my own election agent on only one occasion before this, and that was in 1892. I made myself well acquainted with the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act and its general scope and intention. The declaration in question was sworn to by me in the evening. . . . It was a solemn and sincere declaration that it was all true. (Q.) What did you solemnly and sincerely declare was all true? (A.) That that was a correct statement of the amount of money that I had paid for election expenses.

(Q.) You said you had paid 'the sum of _____ pounds, and no more'? (A.) It was all one paper, and in the first portion of it I had signed as to the amount. . . . I left in the words 'if the candidate is also his own election agent.' (Q.) Immediately after the words 'by my election agent,' which you scored out, came the words 'the sum of _____ pounds, and no more.' Why didn't you fill that up, which occurs three words after those that you have deleted? (A.) I don't know; it was by pure inadvertence. It was not by inadvertence that I scored out the words 'to my election agent.' (Q.) How do you account for your inadvertence in regard to the much more important matter three words further on, in omitting to put in the amount of pounds which represented your election expenses, and which you declare to be true? (A.) I don't know; I cannot explain it. (Q.) How do you come to make a solemn and sincere declaration in regard to a blank sum like that? (A.) Because what I considered the principal and important portion of the paper was the statement of expenses, which shewed the amount of every item. . . . (Q.) In what sense do you say that the declaration and the summary of election expenses were one document; were they fastened together? (A.) Yes; the sheets were all fastened together. (Q.) In the return there is an intermediate form, which appears to be now absent? (A.) Yes, they are separated. I don't know what became of the intermediate form. When I signed and transmitted the declaration and summary of election expenses they were fastened together, but I cannot remember how they were fastened."

Sutherland.

With reference to the Henderson's hiring account, it appeared that this account had been sent in after the petitioner had gone to India to Dr McLean of Thurso, a supporter of the petitioner, who had sent it on to Mrs Clark, saying that she had better pay as her husband was away. Mrs Clark accordingly paid it on 28th November 1895.

It appeared that after the election Dr Clark had gone first to Brussels, then to London in the middle of November, and that he did not return to Wick until the following year. The maximum amount which he might have spent as a candidate was £800 to £900. The amount of expenses incurred by the candidate, as stated in his return, was £77, 10s. 6½d.

A letter was produced from the Sheriff-clerk to Dr Clark, dated 4th September 1895,—". . . What of the Lybster voucher which I have not yet received, and about which I took notice in my former letter? The return is not complete without it. Nicol's voucher was handed to me on the 2d instant.

"I may point out that several blanks, both in the return and in the declaration, were not filled up, and in this way they are both incomplete."

Dr Clark's letter in reply bore :—"London, 23d September 1895.—Dear Sir,—I have just received your letter, having been away on a bicycling tour in Normandy.

"As for the voucher for the payment of the Lybster Hall, I remember putting it in the envelope. I have looked over the accounts, and I find I have vouchers for every payment, except it and the one from Nicol, for hiring. It may however have slipped out when being put up, and if it was not in the envelope when you received the papers it must have tumbled out. I will write to the secretary at Lybster to send you another voucher.

"I thought I filled up the return properly, and I waited till the

No. 140. last day in order to get Nicol's voucher, but he never sent me one or acknowledged my cheque. He has, however, sent you the voucher, and I hope the secretary of the Lybster Hall Co. will send you a duplicate."

Clark v.
Sutherland.

On 9th March 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor in the same terms as the interlocutor of 14th January, in addition refusing the petitioner's motion for leave to amend.*

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—All accounts should have been sent in within fourteen days. Any sent in later should not have been paid—sec. 19 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883—and yet the petitioner had paid Nicol's and Henderson's. The return was made too late. "Transmit" did not mean "post." All the vouchers were not sent in at the same time as the return, and Henderson's was never sent in at all. Further—and probably this was the gravest error—the declaration was blank as to the sum of expenses. It was in fact inept, and no declaration at all. The petitioner, though warned by the Sheriff-clerk, took no steps to correct the mistakes. Indeed, he had left the constituency and then gone abroad without making any arrangements whatever for settling up the matters connected with his election. Such a series of errors—even though any one of them individually might be excused on the ground of inadvertence—shewed such an utter disregard and neglect of the statutory requirements as to bring them within the category of errors due to want of good faith.¹ The petitioner had acted as his own election agent in 1892, and was well acquainted with the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act. He was not entitled in any view to rely on the fact of his having acted as his own election agent to excuse his gross carelessness as a candidate. The amendment should be refused. It was only proposed at the close of the proof. Besides, the petitioner did not move that notice should be given to the constituency. That was absolutely essential, for the new matter really amounted to an additional error, which would of itself form the subject-matter of an independent application for an excuse.

Argued for the petitioner;—The petitioner was probably wrong as to the timeous transmission of the return, and he did not insist in the prayer for an excuse for that. At the same time he conscientiously believed that he was sending the return within the statutory period. Want of good faith was equivalent to dishonesty. There was not a trace of that. The maximum amount of expenses which the petitioner might have incurred was £800 to £900, and within a margin so large he had no interest or object—and indeed none was suggested—for keeping down the return. The omission to enter in detail the hiring accounts was of little importance, for the sums were such as might have been entered in the lump as personal expenditure. With regard to the declaration, the omission in it arose from the petitioner's having acted as his own election agent, in which capacity he had already signed the return, which disclosed the full amount which had been expended by him. The amendment should be allowed without further intimation in the county. The Act did not specify that notice required to be given, and the Court had therefore a discretion. The respondent was the only elector who had come forward when the petition was formerly advertised, and it was not likely that any other person was interested to do so now.

* "OPINION.—I find nothing in this additional evidence to lead me to modify my former conclusion, that the errors and omissions for which an excuse was here sought were not inspired by any sinister motive, but were the result of inadvertence, and not of bad faith. Whether the petitioner requires to be excused for the alleged additional irregularities to which to-day's evidence applies, I of course say nothing. That will come up in another form. All I say at present is, that my present impression would not probably be different although these alleged additional irregularities should be held as proved. What I shall do is to repeat my former interlocutor, inserting merely the words, 'as also the additional evidence led of this date.'"

No. 140.
Mar. 18, 1897.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner, in order to obtain the excuse prayed for, has to satisfy the Court that the omissions to be excused arose from inadvertence and not from want of good faith. The ease or difficulty of making out such a case must depend, to some extent, on the nature of the omissions in each individual instance, and, it might be, on the number of them. Now, it cannot be said that the things specified in the prayer of this petition are in themselves unlikely to have arisen from inadvertence, or are presumptive of bad faith. The omission to send in the return in sufficient time has been withdrawn from the prayer of the petition, and, accordingly, we have no occasion to consider the merits of that question, except in so far as the evidence relating to it may bear on the question of conduct. The omission of the hiring account has the less importance, because this was, properly speaking, an item of personal expenditure, the amount of which might have been added to the sum of personal expenses and never have appeared as a separate item at all. The other omissions are in matters of detail.

The question of inadvertence and good faith being a question of fact and of conduct, I should find it extremely difficult to differ with the Judge who heard the evidence of the petitioner and the other testimony, and who has found that the omissions were caused by inadvertence.

The respondents, however, have shewn that other omissions have occurred on the part of the petitioner for which relief is not sought in this petition. These are relevant to the present question in so far as they may, by their quality or circumstances, throw light on the spirit in which the petitioner performed his duties under the statute, in relation to expenditure and accounts. One of these is certainly, until accounted for, a very grave omission. Every candidate is required to make a solemn declaration stating the total sum which he has spent on the election. In one sense this may be regarded as the most important of all those statutory returns. Yet this candidate attested this return with a blank in the place for the sum, and sent this (which was no return at all) to the statutory officer. The explanation of what at first sight seems gross carelessness, outside the region of inadvertence, is to be found in the fact that the petitioner had acted as his own election agent, and had, at the same time as this skeleton candidate's return was signed, filled up and signed in his own name the election agent's return, shewing the total expenditure and the particulars. When this is known, we see how much more readily the same gentleman might treat as unnecessary what, in his case, he might regard as virtually a repetition of what he had already attested on his personal responsibility.

No. 140. It was also disclosed in evidence that another hiring account had not been stated in the accounts, and had been paid by the petitioner's wife after the time allowed by statute. Our attention was also drawn to the fact that the petitioner had taken no pains to get in accounts, and had, immediately after the election, gone abroad, making no provision for these matters being attended to. It was argued that this, combined with the other omissions, shewed that no honest attention had been paid by this gentleman to the duties imposed upon him in the two capacities which he chose to combine in his own person, and that each of the omissions was thus traced, not to inadvertence, but to a deliberate disregard of the statute.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Clark v.
Sutherland.

I do not think that the facts come up to this, although I accede to the view that a deliberate disregard of the statute could never be treated as inadvertence. The inadvertence must be ~~inadvertence regarding the particular in question~~; there must be a failure in an individual matter, or individual matters, of a general attention. Now, while it is necessary to consider the proceedings of the petitioner in both his qualities (of candidate and of election agent), we are directly concerned with his omissions as candidate. I think, and it is necessary to say this, that the petitioner's duties as agent were performed in a negligent manner. But the fact that he is not a good or efficient agent must not affect our consideration of the manner in which he has done or left undone the statutory duties of candidate. And while, in face of these several violations of the statute, it is impossible to speak of them otherwise than with reprehension, yet we have to remember that, in the exercise of our present jurisdiction, we are necessarily in the region of what is, in greater or less degree, blameable, because it requires an excuse. And as we are sitting as a Court of Appeal, I am not prepared to disturb the judgment of the Lord Ordinary on the evidence taken before him.

I also agree with the Lord Ordinary in declining to allow the proposed amendment of the petition. The petitioner did not desire that this fresh case of omission should be brought within the present petition, unless we could go on and dispose of it without intimation being made in the county. Now, the so-called amendment is simply the introduction of a separate and substantive omission, which, requiring a new prayer for excuse, might of itself form the subject of an application to the Court. It seems to me, therefore, to be clear that under section 34 we would have no option but to appoint some intimation within the county.

Without anticipating anything that may occur in any other proceedings, it may be right to say that, as evidence was led relating to this new omission, it has been within the circumstances which I have found it necessary to consider in disposing of the present application.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I entirely concur, and wish only to make one observation. Your Lordship has stated that there may be a breach of the statute which is not excusable without a corrupt motive—that a wilful disregard of the statutory requirements is sufficient to void an election.

Now, although the Act of Parliament deals liberally with a certain kind of expenditure, and allows a candidate to put down any personal outlays—not exceeding £100—as personal expenditure without requiring him to give details, I do not think that it is a compliance with the Act to put down a merely nominal sum of £2, 2s., because, although details are not required, the actual total expenditure must be stated. I am satisfied, however, that in this case there was no intention to evade the statute by putting down a nominal sum. Mr Clark's personal expenditure was really very small, because he took advantage of the hospitality of his friends during the period of his election tour. Accordingly, he had very little to pay except these hires, which for some reason appear to have been overlooked.

Clark v.
Sutherland.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

The respondent moved for expenses both in the Outer and in the Inner-House, on the ground that he had come forward in the public interest.

The petitioner moved for expenses on the ground that he had been successful, contending that whatever justification the respondent might have pleaded in the Outer-House, he should not have presented a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the matter. By doing so he shewed that he was acting not so much in the public interest as from party rancour.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We must deal with the question of expenses on the footing that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor stands as to the expenses as well as to the merits of the case. I have always understood the correct practice to be as follows. When a reclamer says that the Lord Ordinary is wrong on the merits of a case, and asks that his judgment should be reversed, if this be done, there must be a fresh discussion as to expenses, because the standing disposal of that question has gone by the board, and the new disposal of expenses must be consequential on the new determination of the merits, whatever it may be. But when he says that, even if the Lord Ordinary's decision be right on the merits, it is wrong on the expenses, in that case he should in opening make a motion on that point. Nothing of the kind has been done here, and on that account, and not because we are of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's decision was right, we must hold that the respondent is not entitled to Outer-House expenses. What then of the Inner-House expenses? We have adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and in accordance with the well-known rule in such cases we must find Dr Clark entitled to the expenses of the reclaiming note, simply because the reclaiming note is refused.

LORD ADAM.—I agree. I think that your Lordship's statement of the principle which regulates expenses in such circumstances as we have here is correct. This is not a case in which the expenses follow the merits. Mr Jameson's position is this. He says, esto that the Lord Ordinary is right on the merits, he is wrong on the question of expenses. That is a substantive ground for reclaiming against the interlocutor, and should have been opened on.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is a fair question for consideration whether, when a respondent in a petition of this kind confines himself to fair cross-examination of the witnesses and criticism of the evidence, he is not entitled

No. 140. to get his expenses on the ground that he appears in the interest of the general body of electors to assist the Court in scrutinising the evidence. If this point had been taken in reclaiming against the Lord Ordinary's finding with regard to expenses, I should have been prepared to give it favourable consideration, but as the point was not opened on we cannot deal with it.

Mar. 18, 1897.
Clark v.
Sutherland

The expenses of the reclaiming note are in a different position, because I am inclined to think that the integrity and purity of elections are sufficiently vindicated if the questions are submitted to the Judge of first instance. The reclaimer would appear to have persisted rather in the interests of party than in the interests of the constituency as a whole.

THE COURT adhered, and found the petitioner entitled to the expenses of the reclaiming note.

THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF EDINBURGH, Respondents.—Comrie Thomson—Boyd.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Alteration of structure—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), sec. 49.—Section 49 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, enacts that the Dean of Guild Court may decline to grant warrant for the alteration of any existing house or building until it is satisfied that the plans provide suitably for "strength of materials, stability, mode of access, light, ventilation, and other sanitary requirements."

In a petition for warrant to add to an existing building, held that the light and ventilation as to which the Dean of Guild required to be satisfied were the light and ventilation of the additional building for the erection of which warrant was craved, and that the Dean of Guild was not entitled to refuse a warrant on the ground that the proposed addition would interfere with the light and ventilation of the existing buildings.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Alteration of structure—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), sec. 50, as amended by section 34, subsection 7, of the Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal and Police Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. cliv.).—Section 50 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, as amended by section 34, subsection 7, of the Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1893, after enacting that every dwelling-house must have an open space of specified extent behind it, provides, inter alia, "that in the case of the erection of houses with shops on the ground floor, or of the conversion of a house into a building to be used for business premises only, the Dean of Guild Court may sanction the erection of saloons upon such open space of such height and construction as to them shall seem proper, . . . but where any building is to be used for business premises as much open space shall be required as in the discretion of the Dean of Guild Court shall be sufficient for the purposes of light and ventilation."

In 1893 the proprietor of a tenement used for business purposes, situated in Queen Street, Edinburgh, obtained warrant from the Dean of Guild for the erection of a hall and buildings accessory thereto on an open space behind the street tenement. In 1896 the proprietor applied for authority to erect a room to be used as a cloak-room in connection with the hall above part of the buildings erected under the warrant previously granted by the Dean of Guild. The Magistrates of Edinburgh opposed the petition, on the ground that the proposed addition to the height of the buildings on the back-ground would prejudicially affect the light and ventilation of the street tenement. The Dean of Guild refused to grant the warrant craved. No. 141.

Saltoun v.

On appeal held that the provisions of section 50 did not apply, in respect that the application was neither for warrant to erect a new building nor for warrant to convert a dwelling-house into business premises.

(ANTE, vol. xxiii. p. 956.)

Lord Saltoun and others, trustees for the Supreme Council for Scotland of the 33d and last Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish rite of Freemasonry, applied to the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh for a warrant to construct a room over a portion of the flat roof of a building at the back of No. 74 Queen Street, of which they were proprietors.

1st DIVISION.
Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

The petitioners had acquired the tenement No. 74 Queen Street, and certain ground behind it, in 1893, and in accordance with a warrant obtained from the Dean of Guild Court they had erected on the ground at the back of the tenement a hall and other buildings accessory thereto. These other buildings, which were flat-roofed and of considerably less height than the hall, were situated between the hall and the street tenement, and were connected with the latter by a covered corridor. It was on a portion of these flat-roofed buildings that the petitioners proposed to erect the building for which warrant was craved.

The plans having been remitted to the Burgh Engineer, he returned them with the following indorsation upon them:—"This place is already sufficiently built on, having regard to the light and ventilation of existing buildings."

On 11th June 1896 the Dean of Guild, "in respect that all the open space presently existing is required for the proper lighting and ventilation of the premises in question, refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns."

The petitioners having appealed to the First Division, the Magistrates of Edinburgh appeared by minute, and tendered answers to the petition, and the Court having allowed these to be received remitted to the Dean of Guild to proceed—(ANTE, vol. xxiii. p. 956).

A record was thereafter made up in the Dean of Guild Court.

The petitioners explained that the hall had been originally built for their own purposes, but having been found convenient for private social entertainments, it was hired out for that purpose; and that the purpose of the present application was to obtain warrant for the erection of a ladies' cloak-room to be used in connection with the hall. They denied that the addition would interfere with the light and ventilation of their property, and averred that the street tenement was not used as a dwelling-house.

The respondents founded, inter alia, on section 49 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891,* and averred that the Saltoun v.

Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The petitioners pleaded;—(2) The respondents have neither right nor title to appear and oppose the granting of the warrant, and they should be found liable in the expenses of their opposition.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The area on which the petitioners propose to construct buildings having been previously covered with buildings, the appeal ought to be dismissed. (2) As the proposed buildings will diminish the space which in the discretion of the Dean of Guild Court is required for the purposes of the light and ventilation of the property belonging to the petitioners, the petition should be dismissed.

On 10th December 1896 the Dean of Guild repelled the second plea for the petitioners, and of new refused the prayer of the petition.*

The petitioners appealed, and argued;—1. The light and ventilation in regard to which the Dean of Guild required to be satisfied under section 49 were the light and ventilation of the building for the erection of which warrant was craved. This clearly appeared from a reference to the various provisions dealing with strength and stability,¹ access,² and light and ventilation.³ 2. The public interest not being involved, the magistrates had no title to oppose the petition. 3. Section 50 did not apply, the warrant craved being neither for the erection of houses with shops, nor for the conversion of dwelling-houses into warrant for the erection of any house or building, or for the alteration of any existing house or building, until the said Court is satisfied that the plans provide suitably for strength of materials, stability, mode of access, light, ventilation, and other sanitary requirements, and are otherwise in conformity with the provisions of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts."

By section 50 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, as amended by section 34, subsection (7), of the Edinburgh Improvement and Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. cliv.), it is enacted as follows (the provision added by the later Act being printed in italics):—"Every new house, and any building altered for the purpose of being used as a house, shall have in the rear thereof, or directly attached thereto, and pertaining to, and used exclusively in connection with such new house or building altered for the purpose of being used as a house, an open space at least equal to three-fourths of the area to be occupied by the intended house, where such house is not of greater height than four storeys; and where such house shall exceed that height, such open space shall be of equal area with that of such house . . . provided also that in the case of the erection of houses with shops on the ground floor, or of the conversion of a house into a building to be used for business premises only, the Dean of Guild Court may ~~sanction~~ the erection of saloons ~~upon~~ such open space of such height and construction as to them shall seem proper, such saloons to continue so long only as such building is so used for business purposes; but where any building is to be used for business premises as much open space shall be required as in the discretion of the Dean of Guild Court shall be sufficient for the purposes of light and ventilation, but not exceeding the extent required by this section in the case of a house."

Section 3 of the Act defines "house" as "dwelling-house."

* "NOTE.—After a consideration of the petitioners' plans, the terms of a report by the Burgh Engineer, and an inspection of the subjects by the Dean of Guild and his Council, the Dean of Guild is of opinion that the operations proposed by these petitioners do not provide suitably for light and ventilation."

business premises. The hall differed in character from the buildings No. 141. described as saloons in Scott and Blakeney,¹ and it was not admitted that its erection had been sanctioned under section 50. That section contained no prohibition against the erection on the ground behind business premises of buildings other than saloons, and conferred no right on the Dean of Guild to prevent buildings being erected on such ground for business purposes only. The addition made to the section by the Amendment Act of 1893 was not applicable, (1) because the buildings were erected before that Act came into operation; and (2) because the proposed addition would not decrease the unbuilt-on space.

Mar. 19, 1897.
Saltoun v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Argued for the respondents;—1. Section 49 conferred upon the Dean of Guild an absolute discretion as to what was suitable provision for light and ventilation, and there was nothing in the section to limit the Dean of Guild in the exercise of that discretion to a consideration of the necessities of the buildings proposed to be erected. In holding that the provision for light and ventilation was insufficient, the Dean of Guild had proceeded on the footing that the whole building was an unum quid, and that was the reasonable view. Even if the Dean of Guild's discretion were not absolute, the Court would be slow to interfere with the exercise of that discretion in practical matters.² 2. The hall was a building of a character that fell within the statutory category of "saloon";¹ the sanction for its erection had been obtained under section 50, and the height being within the absolute discretion of the Dean of Guild, could not be increased without his authority.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh, refusing an application for authority to make a small addition to a building in Queen Street, Edinburgh. The facts are not in dispute, and the question which we have considered is whether the refusal of the warrant is justified by the terms of the statute upon which the Dean of Guild Court has professed to act.

The petitioners are trustees for the council of one of the Orders of Freemasons, and they set forth in their petition that they purchased the tenement No. 74 Queen Street for the purpose of building a hall on the area behind the building, and that, after obtaining the necessary warrant from the Dean of Guild Court, a masonic hall was built on the vacant ground. The petitioners, it is stated, had originally intended that the hall should be appropriated to their own uses exclusively, but they had found it convenient to let the hall occasionally for private social entertainments, and with the view of making it more suitable for that purpose they proposed to make an addition to the building in the shape of an apartment placed over the corridor which connects the hall with the house in Queen Street. The corridor, it may be explained, is of less elevation than the hall, so much so, that the corridor and the proposed apartment (intended to be used as a lady's cloak-room) do not together exceed the height of the hall.

The case was first considered by the Dean of Guild Court ex parte, and

On an appeal to this Court, the Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh appeared in support of the interlocutor, and gave in answers to the petition. By interlocutor dated 3d July 1896 this Court allowed the answers to be received, and remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild Court for further procedure. After a further hearing the Dean of Guild Court adhered to its opinion, and of new refused the prayer of the petition. From this judgment, which is dated 10th December 1896, the petitioners have appealed, and the whole case is now before the Court.

Mar. 19, 1897.
Saltoun v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

It is not disputed that the Court has jurisdiction to review the judgments of the magistrates of royal burghs on the merits, and if necessary for determining the true question in issue, we have power to allow a proof, or to obtain a report from skilled persons. But according to the constitution of the Court of the Dean of Guild, the magistrate and his council are entitled to act on their own professional knowledge, with the assistance of the Burgh Engineer, whose duty it is to examine the plans of any proposed building, and to report as to whether the statutory requirements as to drainage, lighting, and ventilation are satisfied by the plans. The jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild to a large extent involves the exercise of personal judgment and skill, and I believe that your Lordships would be very unwilling to interfere with the judgment of the Dean of Guild Court on a purely practical question. The present case, however, raises a question on the construction of the 49th section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1892. With respect to the 50th section, which was also founded on, I shall only say that it has no application, because this is neither the case of the erection of premises, nor of the conversion of a house into a building adapted for business purposes, but is the case of an alteration of an existing building not involving the appropriation of any unbuilt-on area.

By the 49th section the Burgh Engineer is to report to the Dean of Guild Court whether in his opinion the plans (that is, the building plans for which a warrant is sought) are in conformity with the provisions and requirements of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts, and then it is added, the Dean of Guild Court may decline to grant a warrant for the erection of any house or building, or for the alteration of any existing house or building, until the said Court is satisfied that the plans provide suitably for strength of materials, stability, mode of access, light, ventilation, and other sanitary requirements.

This is a very important, and, I do not doubt, a very necessary power, but it is perfectly clear that if a warrant is refused or delayed in the lawful exercise of this power, it must be because of the failure to make provision in the plans of the proposed building, or proposed alteration of a building, for something which ought to be there. I am unable to see how the refusal of the warrant in the present case can be supported consistently with the statute.

The report of the Burgh Engineer indorsed on the building plan is in these terms—"This place is sufficiently built on, having regard to the light and ventilation of existing buildings." The first interlocutor refusing the petition is just a paraphrase of the Burgh Engineer's report, because the petition is refused "in respect that all the open space presently existing is required for the proper lighting and ventilation of the premises in question."

By "premises in question" I understand either the masonic hall, or the masonic hall and the tenement in Queen Street taken together, because the meaning cannot be that all the open space is required for the lighting and ventilation of the ladies' cloak-room. But then the question referred to the Dean of Guild Court under the 49th section is the sufficiency of the provisions for lighting and ventilation shewn in the plans—in other words, the lighting and ventilation of the new apartment; and this question is not at all considered in the Dean of Guild's interlocutor. I grant that in the matter of ventilation it is necessary to consider the adjacent buildings, and if it had been found in fact that the new apartment could not be ventilated by reason of its proximity to other buildings, the judgment would have been relevant. But I do not suppose that this was intended; in any case, it is not said.

Again, I do not quite understand what is meant by the finding that all the open space existing is required for the proper lighting of the premises in question. As regards lighting, the only question is, whether the new apartment is sufficiently lighted by the windows shewn on the plans, and the interlocutor says nothing to the contrary.

Passing to the interlocutor of 10th December, in which the petition is of new refused, the note to the interlocutor merely states "that the operations proposed by these petitioners do not provide suitably for light and ventilation." If this was meant to indicate anything different from the ground of judgment expressed in the previous interlocutor, I should expect to find the difference explained. I assume that the ground of judgment is the same, the variation being merely verbal. I am of opinion that the appeal should be sustained, and the case remitted, with an instruction to grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted the case to the Dean of Guild, with an instruction to grant the prayer of the petition.

The agreement was yearly, and might be terminated at any Whitsunday on four months' notice. On G.'s death (on 14th May 1895) the landlord took possession of the farm, and sold the horses, &c.

Within seven months after G.'s death his estates were sequestrated, and Traill's Trustees.* Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the contract was terminated by G.'s death, and that the landlord thereupon became entitled to take possession of the farm and of the horses, implements, and crop, as proprietor thereof, and that his possession was not open to challenge either under the Act 1696, cap. 5, or section 110 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.*

1ST DIVISION. ON 8th April 1887 the trustees acting under a trust-disposition granted by James Christie Traill of Rattar, as proprietors of Castlehill Home Farm, entered into an agreement entitled a "Memorandum of arrangements in regard to management of Home Farm," with George Gunn. The agreement was to the effect, inter alia, that the part of the farm in arable rotation, being ninety-five acres in extent, should be given rent free to Mr Gunn, "as part of his salary as ground officer."

"4. The whole of the stock, crop, and implements on the farm to be sold by auction shortly before Whitsunday 1887, except three horses and the implements necessary to work the above ninety-five acres. The horses and implements retained, as well as the corn crop of 1887, fallow break, dung, &c., to be valued . . . in the same way as if Mr Gunn were incoming tenant to the farm . . . at Whitsunday 1887.

"This valuation to be signed by Mr Brims [factor on estate] and Mr Gunn, as the agreed-on value of these articles at Whitsunday 1887.

"5. The arrangement contained in this memorandum to subsist for one year from Whitsunday 1887. If either party wishes to terminate arrangement at Whitsunday 1888, or at any subsequent term of Whitsunday, such party to give four months' notice before Whitsunday of their wish to do so, and in this case a valuation to be made at the termination of the arrangement in the same way as at the commencement, and the difference in value to be paid either to Mr Gunn or by Mr Gunn, as the case may be.

"6. Mr Gunn to give to the factor on the estate at each term of Whitsunday a valuation similar to that made at the commencement of arrangement, in order that the factor may satisfy himself of the value of the stock, crop, implements, &c. on the farm."

In terms of this agreement Mr Gunn entered to the ninety-five acres at Whitsunday 1887, and obtained possession of the horses, the implements necessary to work the land, and the growing crops, of which a valuation was duly made. Certain cattle which were upon the farm were also valued and handed over to Mr Gunn without any payment by him upon his entering to the farm. No valuation was made of the fallow or dung.

In October 1894 Traill's trustees gave notice to Mr Gunn, terminating the agreement at Whitsunday (old style, May 26th) 1895. Mr Gunn died on 14th May 1895. Upon his death Traill's trustees entered into possession of the farm and stock and implements thereon.

On 6th July 1895 Mr Gunn's estates were sequestrated. Traill's trustees lodged a claim in the sequestration for £8, 14s. 4d, "being the difference between the value of the stealbow effects and others handed over to the said deceased George Gunn at his entry to the farm of Castlehill, and the amount thereof as realised at a dispenishing sale and valuation at his outgoing."

In May 1896 William Torrance, trustee in the sequestration, raised an action against Traill's trustees concluding for declarator that the farm stock and implements, the growing corn crop, the fallow break, dung, and first year's grass, which were in possession of Mr Gunn at the date of his death, belonged to Mr Gunn, and vested in the pursuer as his trustee, and for decree ordaining the defenders to account for their intromissions therewith.

The pursuer set forth and founded on the memorandum dated 8th April 1887, and averred that George Gunn "received possession of and dealt with said farm, implements, stock, and crops as his own absolute property, and the value of said subjects was treated by the defenders as a debt due to them by him." (Cond. 7) In December 1894 Mr Gunn was rendered notour bankrupt, and continued thereafter to be notour bankrupt down to the date of his death. After his death the defenders appointed a valuation to be made of the stock and implements on the farm, and having taken possession of the same, sold them by auction and unwarrantably retained the proceeds. (Cond. 8) The defenders also took possession of the growing crop, fallow break, dung, and first year's grass on the farm, and sold and disposed of them to the incoming tenant at Whitsunday 1895.

The defenders, in their answers (3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th), made averments to the effect that after parties had signed the memorandum they had agreed that certain cattle on the farm should be valued over to Mr Gunn on the terms expressed in the memorandum with regard to the horses and implements; that the valuation of the fallow break and dung should be dispensed with; that the fallow break, dung, and new grass in the farm at the termination of the agreement should be accepted by the defenders as the equivalent of the corresponding items at Mr Gunn's entry; and that Mr Gunn had possessed the farm, stock, and implements on the terms set forth in the memorandum as thus modified. They also averred that the horses and implements of which the tenant obtained possession at his entry remained on the farm till his death. They did not admit that the tenant was notour bankrupt in December 1894.

The pursuer did not admit these averments, nor did he admit that the value of the subjects handed over to Mr Gunn at entry exceeded the value of the corresponding articles upon the farm at his death.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The estate and effects condescended on having been in bonis of the deceased George Gunn at his death, the pursuer, as his trustee in bankruptcy, is entitled to decree. (3) The deceased George Gunn having been notour bankrupt at the date of his death, and the defenders having acquired an illegal preference over his other creditors by taking possession of the said estate and effects, the pursuer is entitled to decree, as concluded for. (5) No relevant defence.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (4) On a sound construction of the memorandum of agreement, the articles handed over to Mr Gunn, or in any event, the horses and implements, did not become his property, but were merely hired to him. (5) The defenders having lawfully obtained possession of the stock, implements, &c., are entitled to set off against the sums received by them therefor the amount of the valuations as at Mr Gunn's entry.

On 12th November 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the pursuer's fifth plea in law, and appointed the case to be put to the roll for further procedure.*

* "OPINION.— . . . I do not think it necessary to recite the terms of this agreement, which for the present purpose is sufficiently set forth on record. It was in effect a steelbow arrangement, the deceased getting handed over to him, without payment, at Whitsunday 1887, the stock, implements, growing crop, young grass, fallow break, and dung upon the farm at that date; and the landlords being, on the other hand, entitled at the termination of the tenancy to obtain possession of the corresponding subjects with which the farm should then be equipped. It was of course contemplated that there might, and must, be changes during the tenancy, and in that view it was provided that there should be a valuation at incoming and another at outgoing, and that any difference should be paid in money by the one party to the other. As appears from the valuation made at incoming, No. 28 of process, this agreement was slightly modified after the memorandum was executed, but for present purposes the differences need not be considered. They come merely to this—that certain cattle not mentioned in the memorandum were handed over by the landlords and valued as part of the stock, and that the young grass, fallow break, and dung were not valued at all, the assumption no doubt being that the value of such subjects would necessarily be much the same, one year with another.

"Such being the agreement, what happened, it appears, was this: The arrangement being terminable on four months' notice, notice was in October 1894 given to terminate it at Whitsunday 1895, but on 14th May 1895, as I have already said, Mr Gunn died. It is said, but not admitted, that he had become notour bankrupt in December of the previous year. I shall consider the effect of that presently. But in any case he died, as I have said, shortly before Whitsunday, and after his death the defenders (the landlords) resumed possession of the farm and its contents. Whether they are to be held as having done so at the date of the death or at Whitsunday is not material. I rather take it that the tenancy terminated at the date of the death. But whether that is so or not, it is beyond doubt that for some time before the sequestration the defenders were in full possession of the farm, and of everything upon it which is now in dispute.

"Now the question is, whether in these circumstances it can be held that the stock, implements, and others in dispute were nevertheless at the date of the sequestration, on 6th July, the property of the deceased or his representatives. In my opinion that is a proposition which is not maintainable. I am not able to doubt that at least from Whitsunday onwards the property was in the defenders. They (the defenders) had by the memorandum of 1887 a contract right on the termination of the tenancy to take possession as their own of everything which the pursuer now claims; and that contract right was completed and made real by possession lawfully taken in due course, as I have described, prior to the sequestration. No act of delivery or other formality was necessary, because none was prescribed. The contract was executed just as it fell to be executed, and, having been so before the sequestration, any claim which the pursuer might have otherwise had is, in my opinion, excluded. The case, in short, is not, in my opinion, distinguishable from the case of Davidson's Trustee, 19 R. 808, where a similar question was raised and decided by the Inner-House.

"In the view which I have expressed, it is not necessary to consider

On 15th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary, before further answer, No. 142. allowed the defenders a proof habili modo of the averments contained in their answers to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the condescendence, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation.

Torrance v.
Traill's
Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—It was clear from the terms of the agreement that Mr Gunn had power to sell the stock and crop originally handed over to him, and also the stock and crop afterwards substituted for those originally handed over. It followed that they were his property, and the implements could not be treated as belonging to a different category. All these subjects were therefore in bonis of Mr Gunn at the date of his death. The decision in the case of *Butter*¹ was in the teeth of the law as laid down by all the institutional writers, who held that steelbow was a contract of mutuum, in which the property passed to the tenant. The preference accordingly which the landlord had secured by entering into possession on Mr Gunn's death was illegal.² The right of the landlord was derived from a voluntary deed,—namely, the contract of 1887,—and the obligation of Mr Gunn to restore the subjects handed over to him, or their equivalent, at the termination of the agreement, was an obligation to whether in any case the pursuer's claim could be held to extend to the way-going crop, first year's grass, dung, and fallow break. It may be at least matter of doubt whether, looking to the terms of the deceased's tenancy, he or his creditors had any right of property in these subjects. I refer on this point to that part of my opinion in the case of Sturrock, 18 R. 576, which was affirmed in the Inner-House, and to the authorities there quoted.

“It is said, however,—and this is a different matter—that the pursuer is entitled to challenge and set aside the whole transaction, as constituting a fraudulent preference under the Act of 1696, cap. 5. And the suggestion seems to be that the deceased, having been (as alleged) notour bankrupt at the date of his death, the transfer of property which, on his death or at Whitsunday, took effect as regards the subjects and articles in dispute, was a voluntary act or deed of the deceased operating in favour of prior creditors. Of course, if I had thought that any relevant case had been stated on this head, I should have allowed a proof, the fact of notour bankruptcy not being admitted. But I confess that I am not able to see how the Act of 1696, cap. 5, can be brought into this case. The tenant was dead, the farm was vacant, and the defenders in taking possession did so, not in virtue of any act or deed of the deceased or his representatives, but in virtue of the original agreement, and of nothing else. No doubt if that agreement (the agreement of 1887) had been an agreement having reference to a prior debt, and if it had been performed, as it was, within the period of bankruptcy, the date of the agreement might have been held to be the date when it was performed; and so by construction the whole transaction might have been held to have been a voluntary alienation in breach of the Act. I need hardly, however, say that no such case arises or can be held to arise here. The transaction of 1887 had nothing to do with a prior debt. Even if entered into within the period of bankruptcy, it would have been protected as a novum debitum. Again (the agreement being what it was) had the deceased lived and voluntarily renounced his tenancy at some term within the period of bankruptcy, and by such renunciation had conferred on the defenders rights of property which, but for his action, would have passed to his creditors, the Act of 1696 might have given the creditors redress. But here again no such case has to be considered. The present case, so far as do something in satisfaction of a prior debt. But an act in implement of a general obligation to deliver goods at a future time,² as distinguished from an obligation to return specific goods, was struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5, if it fell within the period of notour bankruptcy.¹ It was not a sufficient answer to say that the act by which the landlord's right was acquired was not a voluntary act, inasmuch as it was the death of the tenant, for the statute was held to strike at every means by which a preference was acquired. In Davidson's Trustee,² although the tenant died insolvent, the effect of notour bankruptcy was not discussed. In the Scottish Provident Institution,³ the contract gave the creditor a right to perfect his security at once by intimation, but here the landlord's right was only to be completed at a future date. If Mr Gunn had lived and allowed the landlord to enter into possession, it would have been an illegal act, and it was equally illegal on the part of his representatives to allow it. Further, if any difficulty were supposed to arise from the fact of Mr Gunn's death being the termination of the arrangement, it was obviated by section 110 of the Bankruptcy Act,* in terms of which the landlord's right had not been lawfully completed outwith the period of constructive bankruptcy.

Argued for the defenders;—The memorandum bore to be, and was in reality, an agreement for purposes of management. The stock, the Act of 1696 is concerned, is, I think, not substantially different from the quite familiar case of a lease—say of a sheep farm—when the tenant, on the one hand, receives the sheep stock at entry on certain terms, and, on the other hand, is bound at the outgoing to leave the sheep stock to the landlord or incoming tenant on similar terms. It has never, so far as I know, been suggested that if such an arrangement happens to be carried out before sequestration, but within the period of bankruptcy, actual or constructive, the rights acquired hinc inde, although resulting, it may be, in benefit to the landlord, and in prejudice to the creditors, could be reduced as in contravention of the Act of 1696.

"I am therefore prepared to hold that, in so far as the pursuer's case is laid upon the Act of 1696, cap. 5, his averments are irrelevant. And on the whole case I should be prepared to decide in favour of the defenders, but for two difficulties which arise from the state of the pleadings. In the first place, the pursuer does not admit, though he seemed hardly to controvert, the defenders' statements in answers 3, 4, and 5 relative to the addition of the cattle to the stock given over in 1887, and the non-valuation at that time of the dung, first year's grass, and fallow break. He indeed pleads that the averments in those answers can only be proved by writ or oath, and he does not even seem to admit the authenticity of the valuation No. 28 of process, on which both parties seemed to found at the debate. In the next place, the pursuer does not admit that the valuation of 1887 was in excess of the valuation of 1895, so as to exclude the possibility of a balance being due by the defenders in an accounting. I do not know that these are matters which are seriously in dispute. Indeed the argument proceeded practically on the assumption of the defenders' averments, but until the matters of fact referred to have been cleared up either by a proof or admission, I am afraid that I cannot at present do more in the way of decision than to repel the pursuer's plea to the relevancy of the defence."

crop, and implements were merely handed over to Mr Gunn for his use, and did not become his property. The arrangement resembled a steelbow contract, and the subjects handed over under such a contract remained the property of the landlord.¹ But assuming the property in the subjects to have passed to Mr Gunn, the Act of 1696 was not applicable unless a security were conferred upon the creditor by the voluntary act of the debtor,² and section 110 of the Bankruptcy Act did not apply unless there was either a voluntary act of the debtor or diligence by the creditor.³ Here there was neither, the right of the landlord arising from the death of the bankrupt, and not being acquired by any diligence on the landlord's part. Further, the right of the landlord was not a preference or security in the sense of the statutes, but was a contract right, and having been duly completed before the sequestration, it could not be challenged.⁴ The pursuer, as Gunn's representative, could not insist on his rights under the agreement, unless he fulfilled his obligations under it.⁵

LORD ADAM.—(After narrating the facts)—It appears to me that when Mr Gunn died on 14th May 1895 the arrangement dated 8th April 1887 came to an end, and the defenders were then entitled to enter into immediate possession of the farm. It is alleged that Mr Gunn was notour bankrupt at the time, but, however that might be, he had not been sequestered, and no trustee was in existence. Nor had any creditor attempted to acquire a preference or right over any of the articles into possession of which the defenders had entered, and no diligence had been used by poinding or otherwise. In these circumstances the defenders had only to deal with matters as under the agreement, without the intervention of any third party. That being so, under the contract it appears to me that the defenders were entitled to take immediate possession of the articles embraced in the agreement as their own, paying only the difference of value, if any, appearing in the valuation taken at the termination as compared with that taken at entry under the agreement. They did enter into immediate possession of the articles, and having thus obtained full and legal possession of the articles it appears to me that they became again their property—if they had ever ceased to be, which the defenders deny. The articles therefore did not, in my opinion, vest in the pursuer on the subsequent sequestration of Mr Gunn. In terms of the contract the pursuer is only entitled to the difference, if any, between the valuation at entry and at the termination of the arrangement.

I do not see that the Act 1696, cap. 5, has anything to do with the case. The arrangement under which all that I have described took place was not a fraudulent transaction, and the death of Mr Gunn, which brought the arrangement to a termination, surely cannot be called a voluntary act on his part.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I do not think it very material to consider whether the agreement of 1887 left the parties in the ordinary position of landlord and tenant as to the subjects in dispute, or whether these relations might not be modified in respect of other considerations. However that may be, I am satisfied, with your Lordship, that the effect of the agreement was, that upon the bankrupt's death the defenders were entitled to enter into possession of the articles in dispute, subject to any question which may still remain open under the interlocutor allowing a proof.

It cannot be suggested that the agreement of 1887 was a fraud upon the creditors, or in any respect prejudicial to them. It appears to me to be unassailable on any such ground, and that the only question is, whether the death of the bankrupt is an event which is struck at by the Act of 1696, or any similar provision of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. It appears to me to be quite clear that it is not. The effect of the agreement as made was to enable the defenders to enter into possession of the articles in question without any additional security or any additional aid, and therefore there was no voluntary act or preference of any kind within the period of constructive bankruptcy that could bring the case within the scope of the statutes.

Gordon v.
Bruce & Co.

WILLIAM GORDON, Petitioner (Respondent).—Salvesen.
JOHN BRUCE & COMPANY, Respondents (Appellants).—A. J. Young.

Process—Extra cursum curiæ—Arbitration—Appeal—Competency when no answers lodged—Petition for recall of arrestments—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 114), sec. 21.—Section 21 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, enacts that "it shall be competent for any Sheriff, from whose books a warrant of arrestment has been issued on the petition of the debtor or defender duly intimated to the creditor or pursuer, to recall or restrict such arrestment, . . . provided that the Sheriff shall allow answers to be given in to the said petition, and shall proceed with the further disposal of the cause in the same manner as in summary causes, and his judgment shall be subject to review in the Court of Session."

In a petition for recall of arrestments the respondent lodged no answers, and the Sheriff "having heard parties" recalled the arrestments on caution. The respondent having appealed, the petitioner objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the respondent, in failing to lodge answers, had so deviated from the course of procedure prescribed by the statute as virtually to constitute the Sheriff an arbiter. The Court held that there had been no deviation from the statutory procedure, and repelled the objection.

Opinion (per Lord McLaren and Lord Kinneare) that a deviation from the ordinary course of judicial procedure does not constitute the proceedings an arbitration unless it follows upon an agreement by the parties and is assented to by the Judge.

In February 1897 John W. Bruce & Company raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against William Gordon, builder there, for £6400, for loss and damage alleged to have been sustained by them through the defender's fault. No. 143.
May 12, 1897.
Gordon v.
Bruce & Co.

On the dependence of this action they used arrestments.

In March 1897 Gordon presented a petition for recall of the arrestments. 1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The petition was served upon Bruce & Company, but they did not lodge any answers.

Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced an interlocutor, by which he, "having heard parties' procurators," on the petitioner finding caution to the amount of £300, recalled the arrestments.

The respondents appealed to the Court of Session, and on the case appearing in the Single Bills the petitioner objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued ;—The provisions of section 21 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838,* were imperative, and the respondents were bound to lodge answers. Not having done so, they had lost their right to submit the Sheriff's judgment to review. By their deviation from the course of procedure prescribed by the statute they had virtually constituted the Sheriff an arbiter.¹ In any view, there being no record, there was no means of knowing what had been before the Sheriff. The Appellate Court could not review a judgment without having the pleadings of both parties before them.

Argued for the appellants ;—There had been no deviation from the statutory course of procedure. The case fell to be disposed of as a summary cause, and it was a matter of every-day practice for a Sheriff to decide summary causes without requiring answers to be lodged. Even assuming that there had been a deviation extra cursum curiæ, it was not suggested that the deviation was a matter of agreement between the parties, and such an agreement was necessary in order to constitute the Sheriff an arbiter.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The section provides that the Sheriff shall allow answers to be given in, and shall proceed with the further disposal of the action in the same manner as with summary cases, and that his judgment shall be subject to review in the Court of Session.

Now, Mr Salvesen has not made out that, if this had been an ordinary summary case, it was incompetent, or extra cursum curiæ, for the Sheriff, no answers having been given in, to proceed to hear parties, and to dispose of the cause. That being so, and the statute pointing to summary procedure as the criterion of procedure, I am not satisfied that there has been

* The Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 114), sec. 21, enacts, " . . . it shall be competent for any Sheriff, from whose books a warrant of arrestment has been issued on the petition of the debtor or defender, duly intimated to the creditor or pursuer, to recall or restrict such arrestment on caution or without caution as to the Sheriff shall appear just ; provided that the Sheriff shall allow answers to be given in to the said petition, and shall proceed with the further disposal of the cause in the same manner as in summary causes, and his judgment shall be subject to review in the Court of Session."

May 12, 1897.
Gordon v.
Bruce & Co.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite true that if parties deliberately agree to go out of the ordinary cursus curiæ, they may deprive themselves of the right of appeal. But, then, in many instances, parties may go out of the ordinary cursus curiæ by mistake, and to say that an error in procedure of that nature makes the Sheriff an arbiter is, to my mind, altogether out of the question.

LORD M'LAREN.—If it were necessary to consider the legal question which Mr Salvesen raised, I should be disposed to hold that, in order to displace the right of review, it is not enough to say that there had been a deviation from the course of procedure prescribed by statute. That might be the very thing complained of in the appeal or reclaiming note. If deviation is shewn to have been the act of the parties to the case assented to by the Judge, then only do the proceedings become a proper arbitration.

In this case I do not think that there has been any deviation from the procedure prescribed by statute. The Act provides—[quotes section]. I take that to mean that if the respondent moves the Sheriff for leave to lodge answers, the Sheriff cannot refuse the motion. But then the application is to be dealt with in the same manner as summary causes, and it is a matter of ordinary practice that, in summary cases, a party to whom intimation has been made is entitled to be heard without the necessity of first lodging answers. If the question is merely as to the amount of caution, or again if it is merely as to the choice of a particular individual for the office, e.g., of judicial factor, answers are not necessary. When, on the other hand, the party contends that the application is incompetent, or ill-founded on the merits, it is proper that answers should be ordered.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I am not satisfied that there has been any departure from the regular course of procedure, and indeed Mr Salvesen admitted, very properly, that if a respondent does not take advantage of the order of the Sheriff allowing him to lodge answers, that does not put him out of Court, but leaves the Sheriff to proceed upon the statement of such answers as may be given orally. The procedure in the Sheriff Court therefore was regular, but I agree also with what has been said by Lord M'Laren that a mere deviation from the ordinary course of procedure is not equivalent to a submission of the questions in dispute to a Judge as an arbiter where it proceeds upon a mere error or slip in the conduct of a case, and not upon any agreement to make such a departure.

THE COURT repelled the objection, and sent the case to the Summar Roll.

Bell v. Bell.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Omission to lodge prints—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 71—A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3.—In an appeal in vacation from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints as required by the Act of Sederunt, March 10, 1870, sec. 3. An objection was taken to the competency of the appeal, and the appellant having admitted that the failure to print was not due to inadvertence, the Court dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

THIS was an action brought by Harold F. Bell in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against John Munro Bell for an accounting and payment of £38.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

On 8th March 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton), after a proof, dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, on 22d March 1897, to the Court of Session.

He printed the appeal, record, and interlocutors, but did not print the proof.

On the case being called in the Single Bills, the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the appellant had not printed the proof as required by the A. S., 10th March 1870, section 3.*

Counsel for the appellant explained that the present action touched only part of a larger question which had arisen between the parties; that an action had been raised in the Court of Session to try the whole question, and that accordingly he had intended when the appeal was called to move the Court to remit it ob contingentiam to the Lord Ordinary before whom the Court of Session action was pending. He had come to be satisfied, however, that such procedure was not competent, and he now proposed to follow forth the appeal in ordinary course.

The respondent argued;—There had been here a wilful deviation from the prescribed procedure. The appellant had applied his mind to the question of printing, and it could not therefore be said that his omission to print was formal and innocent, or due to inadvertence. On the contrary, it was deliberate and intentional. The present case was therefore quite distinguishable from the case of Boyd.¹

* The A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3, in virtue of the power given by sec. 106 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, enacted,—“That the course of proceeding prescribed by the 71st section of the said statute” shall be altered to the following extent and effect:—“(2) The appellant shall during vacation, within fourteen days after the process has been received by the Clerk of Court, deposit with the said clerk a print of the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof, if any, unless within eight days after the process has been received by the clerk he shall have obtained from the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills an interlocutor dispensing with printing in whole or in part, . . . and the appellant shall, upon the box-day or sederunt-day next following the deposit of such print with the clerk, box copies of the same to the Court, . . . and if the appellant shall fail within the said period of fourteen days to deposit with the Clerk of Court as aforesaid a print of the papers required . . . or to box or furnish the same as aforesaid on the box-day or sederunt-day next thereafter, he shall be held to have abandoned his appeal, and shall not be entitled to insist therein except upon being reponed as hereinafter provided.”

No. 144.

Bell v Bell.

Argued for the appellant;—Section 71 of the Act of Parliament contained no such regulation about printing as was now sought to be enforced against the appellant. The question arose strictly under an Act of Sederunt, and an Act of Sederunt should be very liberally construed. The Court had a discretion in the matter, and there being no suggestion that any prejudice would arise to the respondent from the technical breach of the Act of Sederunt, the appellant should be allowed to insist in the appeal.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—Even if we were to assign no greater rigidity to the Act of Sederunt than was contended for by Mr Cooper, I still think that his request must be refused.

The Act of Sederunt, at least, lays down what is the rule of practice; and the decision which has been cited is not an exception to the following of the rule, but merely shews that, where the spirit of the rule would not be carried out by a literal compliance with it owing to exceptional circumstances, it will not be misapplied.

But the case cited was a case of inadvertence, and the appellant here is constrained to admit that he did advert to this point; but he had at that time a theory, which on better consideration he is obliged to abandon, that the Court might be successfully moved not to hear the appeal in ordinary course, but to send it to a Lord Ordinary. He accordingly adverted to the duty of printing, and took his chance of not complying with it. He is now proposing to follow out the appeal in ordinary course, and he is asking us to absolve him from the consequences, not of an accidental omission, but of a deliberate and calculated contravention of the rule applicable to appeals.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, and I will only add that, while there may be many cases in which an Act of Sederunt should be enforced in the spirit rather than according to the letter, it has been pointed out to us that this particular regulation is one which comes in place of a provision of an Act of Parliament. It is an enactment under the delegated authority of Parliament to repeal a Parliamentary enactment, and to substitute for it something which experience has shewn to be more suitable in practice. I must hold, then, that such a regulation should be interpreted in the same spirit as if it were in the original Act, because it is to all intents and purposes a statutory regulation.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

THE COURT sustained the objection to the competency of the appeal, and dismissed the appeal.

Reparation—Landlord and Tenant—Known Danger—Promise of land-lord to repair defect.—The wife of a tenant of a house raised an action against the landlord to recover damages. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that the action was relevant. Webster v. Brown, Jan. 12, 1892, 19 R. 765, distinguished.

ON 15th December 1896 Mrs Mary Russel or Shields, wife of 1st Division. James Shields, raised an action against David F. Dalziel to recover damages for personal injury. Lord Kincairney.

The pursuer averred that her husband was tenant of a shop and room belonging to the defender; that he had been tenant since November 1895, conform to a missive of lease.* "In February 1896 the pursuer complained to the defender's factors . . . that the ceiling of the said room was in an apparently insecure condition, and requested that it should at once be put right. The factor at first stated that there was little wrong with the ceiling, but ultimately undertook and promised to put it right. He further admitted that the ceiling required repair. The pursuer relied on the assurance of the said factor that the ceiling would be attended to at the earliest opportunity. Nothing, however, was done by the said factor; and again, in the month of April, his attention was directed to the apparently insecure condition of the ceiling, and an urgent request was made to him by the pursuer to have the matter attended to. The said factor again promised to have the ceiling put right and in a condition of safety, but again nothing was done. The pursuer, relying on the assurances of the said factor, was thereby induced to continue the tenancy of the said shop and room belonging to the defender."

The pursuer further averred, that on 14th November 1896 a portion of the ceiling gave way and fell upon her, whereby she sustained severe injuries.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 2d February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) found that the averments of the pursuer were irrelevant, and assoilzied the defender.†

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The case of Webster,¹ on which the Lord Ordinary based his judgment, was distinguishable, for

* From the missive of lease, it appeared that the pursuer's husband had taken the subjects in the first instance for one month, and continued thereafter in occupation, paying a monthly rent.

† "OPINION.—I am not able to distinguish this case from Webster v. Brown, 12th January 1892, 19 R. 765, and I consider myself therefore bound to hold the averments irrelevant. But for that judgment, I should have been disposed to approve of the issue submitted."

No. 145. there the defect which occasioned the injury was the very same from the first. The condition of the premises—such as it was—remained unaltered. Here there was at most a risk that unless repairs were effected the premises would prove a source of injury. Complaint was duly made, and the defender undertook to remove the risk. It was in reliance on this assurance that the tenant continued to occupy. The present case was analogous to the cases of *M'Martin*¹ and Fulton.¹ Knowledge of a defect on the part of a pursuer was not necessarily a bar to the recovery of damages.²

Shields v.
Dalziel.

Argued for the defender;—The present case was not distinguishable from the case of Webster.³ The tenant here had accepted the subjects with the ceiling in an apparently insecure condition. The complaint to the landlord made no difference.⁴ The risk being patent and known, the landlord was not liable.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—But for the supposed application of Webster,³ the Lord Ordinary says he would have allowed an issue, and it seems to me that, apart from that case, the action is clearly relevant.

As I read the record, the statement made is this,—that at the time of the accident the pursuer was occupying the house as a monthly tenant, on an admission by the landlord that the house required repair in this essential matter of the ceiling, and on an undertaking that that repair would be made. If that be so, I think there is a clear ground of action; and although it has been pointed out that the statement involves a considerable lapse of time, and a carrying forward, through much procrastination, of the landlord's promise, I think the fair meaning of the record is that not merely the promise but the legal undertaking to execute the repairs was extant as a term of the tenancy when the accident occurred. And therefore I think the action quite good.

The case of *Webster*³ seems to apply to a very different state of matters, for the theory of the judgment is that the tenant accepted the house in its apparent and visible condition, which was exactly the same when the accident happened as when the tenant entered. The bad stair was the cause of the accident, and it was no worse then than it was, and was seen to be, at the time of the accident. In the present case the condition of the house was not the same, for the ceiling fell; what was visible when the tenancy began was a risk; and against this risk the landlord bound himself to protect the tenant. The facts here seem to me to necessitate trial by a jury.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

 Annan v.
 Annan's
 Curator Bonis.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis to Minor—Investment of Curatorial Funds—Discharge—Pupils Protection Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict. c. 51), sec. 13.—Held that the passing by the Accountant of Court—at his annual audit of a judicial factor's accounts under section 13 of the Pupils Protection Act, 1849—of investments made by a judicial factor, does not relieve the factor from responsibility for improper investments.

THIS was an action at the instance of Miss Jessie Annan, a minor, with the advice and consent of her mother, against James Hutton, chartered accountant, Glasgow, curator bonis of the pursuer, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that a loan of £1750, made by the defender upon a bond to the Greenock Harbour Trust, was ultra vires of the defender as curator. 1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

In the bond, which was dated 24th March 1885, the Harbour Trustees assigned "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust."

The grounds upon which the investment was challenged by the pursuer were (1) that the loan was outwith the class of investments open to trustees or judicial factors; and (2) that even if it were within the class of authorised investments, it was improvident and bad in itself. It is unnecessary, for the purposes of this report, to refer further to the questions so raised, as it was decided in the case of Cowan's Trustees v. Ferrie's Curator Bonis, supra, p. 590, prior to the present action being heard in the Inner-House, that such a loan was an improper investment of curatorial funds.¹

In the present action, however, the defender averred that the investment complained of was disclosed in his accounts from the first, and was passed by the Accountant of Court without objection at the annual audit under section 13 of the Pupils Protection Act, 1849,* and he maintained, therefore, that he was freed from responsibility.

The following facts bearing on this contention were admitted by the parties, or were established in a proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary:—

In February 1885 the defender, who was at that time factor loco tutoris to the pursuer, lent the sum of £1750 out of the tutorial funds to the Greenock Harbour Trustees upon a bond.

On 11th May 1887 the Greenock Harbour Trust was declared to

* The Pupils Protection Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 13, enacts,—“That the Accountant shall see that the factor's accounts of charge and discharge, with the vouchers thereof, are duly lodged, and shall thereafter examine the same without undue delay, and audit the account on the general principles of ordinary good management for the real benefit of the estate and of those interested therein, and he shall consider the investments of the estate and the sufficiency thereof, and he shall be entitled to require from the factor all necessary information and evidence, and he shall fix the amount of the factor's commission for the period embraced by the audit, according to his opinion of what is just in each particular case, and he shall strike the balance, and shall state the result of the audit in the form of a short report, and if he has made any corrections on the account he shall, if required by the factor, explain such corrections, and his reasons for making them.”

Annan v.

Annan's

Curator Bonis.

The loan was duly entered as an investment of the tutorial funds in the accounts lodged by the defender with the Accountant of Court for the years ending 31st March 1886, 1887, and 1888, and no objection was taken by the Accountant.

The first occasion on which the Accountant made any observation was on receipt of the defender's accounts for the period closing at 31st March 1889, when he wrote on his report—"A sum of £1750 was invested by the factor on Greenock Harbour Trust bond which is not yet due. When the date of payment arrives this bond should be realised. Meantime all questions are reserved.

"Reported this 17th day of April 1889."

On 8th August 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor finding "that the loan in question was not a loan which in the circumstances was justified, and therefore that the defender is bound to make good the loss which has accrued, or may accrue thereon: Appoints the case to be enrolled for further procedure," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and—besides contending that the investment was one which a factor was entitled to make, and that it was a good investment in the circumstances existing at the time it was made—argued;—Under section 13 of the Pupils Protection Act the Accountant was bound to consider the investments disclosed in the defender's accounts from year to year. He—an officer of Court—controlled the factory, and not having taken any exception to the investment in question, the factor could not be held liable in damages for negligence in the selection of it. If the Accountant had reported the matter to the Lord Ordinary under section 14,* and if the Lord Ordinary had approved the investment, the defender would have been freed from liability. If, on the other hand, the Lord Ordinary had sustained the Accountant's objection, the defender would have sold the bond, and so saved any loss to the estate. The Accountant had, by passing the investment, shifted the responsibility on to his own shoulders, and his audit was an indemnity to the defender.

Argued for the respondent;—The case of *Cowan's Trustees*¹ was conclusive as to the incompetency of the investment. Further, the Pupils Protection Act, as its title indicated, was designed for the protection of pupils, and not of factors. There was nothing in section 13 to suggest that what the Accountant approved was to be binding on the pupil, and sections 14 and 15* negatived the view that the Accountant could of himself alter the common law liability of a factor. Section 17* was a complete answer to the defender's contention.

* The Pupils Protection Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict. c. 51), sec. 14, enacts, that "the Accountant shall have power, upon report to and with the approval of the Lord Ordinary, where the sum involved exceeds twenty pounds, . . . to dispense with the rules of exact diligence in any matter of factorial management."

Section 15 provides for the factor's objections to the Accountant's report, and for such objections being disposed of by the Court.

Section 17 enacts that during the subsistence, or after the termination of the factory, it shall be competent for any person beneficially interested to make appearance, and upon cause shewn to open up the audit of all accounts which have been audited by the Accountant in his absence.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether a judicial factor for No. 146.
 a ward is liable personally for a certain investment made by him upon a bond of the Greenock Harbour Trust. The Lord Ordinary has found that May 14, 1897.
 he is liable, and I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The sum here invested Annan v. appears to have been £1750. It was invested in February 1885. We have Annan's had the matter of these Greenock Harbour bonds before us in the recent case Curator Bonis. of Cowan's Trustees.¹ In that case we held that the investment was not of the class of investments in which a judicial factor is entitled to invest the money of a ward, and in accordance with that decision we held the factor in that case liable. The grounds being the same in this case, we must simply adhere to our judgment in that case,—we must hold that this investment was not of the class in which a judicial factor is entitled to invest his ward's money. But an additional argument is made to us in this case, which was mentioned but not maintained in the previous case, namely, that in this case, in the annual audit by the Accountant of Court of the factor's accounts, this particular investment was brought under his notice and was passed as a sufficient investment. The documents bearing upon that shew that from 1886 onwards this particular investment was brought under the Accountant's notice and was originally passed by him without observation.
 But he seems to have observed upon it as early as the year 1889, and then it seems to have been passed. It was argued to us that if this investment was brought under the notice of the Accountant of Court, and was passed by him without objection, it is to be held under the 13th section of the Pupils Protection Act, 1849, that that absolves the judicial factor from liability for the investment, and that it must be held that it was an investment which it was permissible for the judicial factor to make,—that the mere fact of its being passed by the Accountant of Court is conclusive of its being a permissible investment. The words of the 13th section of that Act throw this duty upon the Accountant of Court,—“The Accountant shall see that the factor's accounts of charge and discharge, with the vouchers thereof, are duly lodged, and shall thereafter examine the same without undue delay, and audit the account on the general principles of good ordinary management for the real benefit of the estate and of those interested therein, and he shall consider the investments of the estate and the sufficiency thereof, and he shall be entitled to require from the factor all necessary information and evidence,” &c. The duty laid upon the Accountant of Court was to consider the investment, the sufficiency thereof, and to require all necessary information and evidence and judge of their sufficiency. My opinion is that that clause is not introduced for the purpose and with the object and result of removing from the shoulders of the judicial factor the responsibility which prior to the Act rested upon him, but that it is for him to judge of the class and sufficiency of any investment he chooses to make, and that if he fails in his duty to the Court in that matter, and makes an investment not of the proper class or sufficiency, he will be held personally responsible for so doing. I do not think that the object of the 13th section was to remove a judicial factor's responsibility in any way in that respect. It does not say so. I think the object and intention of introducing

No. 146. that provision in the Act was to provide an additional protection and additional security in favour of the pupils. I altogether demur to the proposition to the effect that that clause removes any liability which prior to the Act rested upon the judicial factor. Indeed, it would be a very strong thing to say that the factor and the Accountant, in the absence of the parties truly interested, namely, the wards themselves, could finally decide as to the permissibility and sufficiency of an investment. Therefore I am of opinion that the 13th section is not applicable as contended for by Mr Salvesen. I do not think it is necessary to advert in detail to the other clauses, because I think the 14th and 15th clauses point in the same direction. Being of opinion that, as in Bringloe's case,¹ this security is not of the class of investments which the judicial factor was entitled to make, I do not think the question of the sufficiency of the security arises, as it would have done had this been a permissible security. But I have only to say that I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary upon that matter too. I think it is obvious that this is not a sufficient security. It was a security of a speculative character, depending upon whether or not the James Watt Dock would be successful or not. That was truly the position of matters. The facts are clearly set forth by the Lord Ordinary. I agree with him, and do not think it necessary to add more.

Annan v.
Annan's
Curator Bohn

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with Lord Adam, for the reasons which he has given, that this case is not distinguishable from that of Bringloe.¹ The only additional observation which I desire to make is, that it appears to me that the statute itself expressly provides against the contention of Mr Salvesen, that an audit by the Accountant is equivalent to a discharge. It appears to me that the audit is merely an additional precaution for the protection of the pupil. That, I think, is perfectly obvious, because the statute by section 17 provides—[quotes]. So that any party may open up any question on the accounts which has been decided in his absence, and that right is given both to any person beneficially interested and to any succeeding factor. Accordingly, when any factor—or his representatives—applies for his discharge the statute has made express provision that his liability shall not be held to be determined by a mere audit, but, on the contrary, that any question which has not been decided between the parties shall still be open. On the remaining questions, I agree with Lord Adam.

The LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur.

Process—Bill-Chamber—Suspension—Sheriff—Interim decree ad factum praestandum—Sist of execution.—In a Sheriff Court action the Sheriff granted warrant to the pursuer to restore a wall which had been interfered with by the defender, to its original condition, but refused to deal with the question of expenses until the wall had been restored.

The interlocutor not being appealable the defender presented a note of suspension praying the Court to interdict the pursuer from interfering with the wall or enforcing the decree. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Pearson) granted interim interdict and passed the note. The pursuer reclaimed, and contended that the suspension was incompetent, and that any sist of execution would prevent an appealable interlocutor being obtained from the Sheriff, and would therefore be permanent. Both parties moved the Court to decide the case on the merits.

The Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, holding that the suspension was competent, but that it was not competent for the Court sitting in the Bill-Chamber to do more than to pass the note.

Wilson v. Bartholomew, July 7, 1860, 22 D. 1410, followed.

THIS was a note of suspension and interdict for the Caledonian Railway Company against Mrs Agnes Gibb or Cochran and others—the trustees of the deceased Robert Cochran—and Alexander Morton, sheriff-officer.

1st Division.
 Bill-Chamber.
 Lord Pearson.

The following were the circumstances in which the note was presented:—

In August 1895 Cochran's Trustees raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Caledonian Railway Company, craving the Court "to interdict the defenders from encroaching in any way on the pursuers' property known as the Verreville Pottery, situated in Finnieston Street, Glasgow, or from interfering in any way with the retaining wall forming the northern boundary of the pursuers' property, and to grant interim interdict; to ordain them instantly to restore the said retaining wall to the condition in which it was before the defenders' interference therewith, and failing their restoring the said wall as aforesaid within such period as the Court shall appoint, to grant warrant to the pursuers to get the said restoration effected; and to find the defenders liable in the expenses thereof, and of this application."

The pursuers stated that their property was bounded on the north by the defenders' line of railway; that under an agreement between them and the defenders a retaining wall was erected along the northern boundary of the pursuers' property; that the defenders were in course of making large openings or spaces in the wall, which they had no right to do; that these endangered the pursuers' property; that the defenders refused to desist; and that it was essential that the wall should be restored to its original state without loss of time.

The defenders stated that the wall was built partly on the pursuers' and partly on the defenders' property, admitted that they had formed two recesses in that part of the wall which was situated on their own property, and denied that these recesses in any way injured the wall or the pursuers' property.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced the following inter-

No. 147. locutors:—"Glasgow, 8th November 1895.—Having heard parties' procurators, and made avizandum, interdicts the defenders from interfering to any further extent than what they have already done with the retaining wall in question, except by agreement with pursuers, or unless warrant be granted by a competent Court of law on the application by the defenders, and declares the same perpetual: Quoad ultra appoints the case to be enrolled on the Procedure-roll of the 27th inst. with regard to the other cravings of the petition."*

May 21, 1897.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Cochran's
Trustees.

"Glasgow, 9th December 1895.—Having heard parties' procurators and made avizandum, finds it is stated by the respondents' agent that an order in this Court on the respondents to restore the retaining wall in question to the condition in which it was before it was interfered with by respondents will not be complied with: Finds it therefore unnecessary to order the respondents to restore as craved within a certain period; but, in terms of the alternative craving, grants warrant to pursuers to restore the said wall to the same condition in which it was previous to the interference therewith at the sight of Mr William Crouch, C.E., Glasgow, reserving to pronounce further."

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff, who on 29th October 1896 adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor, and remitted to him for further procedure.

The Sheriff-substitute then pronounced the following interlocutors:—"Glasgow, 11th November 1896.—Having heard parties, refuses defenders' motion that the Court should hoc statu deal with the question of expenses."†

"Glasgow, 19th February 1897.—Having heard parties' procurators, grants warrant to and authorises Alexander Morton, one of the sheriff-officers of the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, and as representing the said Court, to take possession of the retaining wall in question, to the effect of seeing that the operations authorised by the interlocutors of 9th December 1895 and 29th October 1896 to be done by pursuers at the sight of Mr Crouch, C.E., are duly carried out; and for that purpose grants warrant to the said Alexander Morton to enter the defenders' premises, and to take and use such assistance as he

* "NOTE.—. . . In the prayer of the petition in this action there is a further craving to restore the retaining wall to the state in which it was previous to the interference complained of. I send the case to the Procedure-roll of Wednesday, the 27th inst., with reference to this other craving. If the above judgment be acquiesced in or becomes final, I will then deal with the other point."

† "NOTE.—Defenders' agent requested me to deal at this stage of the case with the question of expenses of process, I understand, on the theory that he could at once appeal to the Court of Session if I did so. I do not express an opinion as to whether an appeal hoc statu is or is not competent to the Court of Session. I am, however, clear that this is not the stage for me to deal with the question of expenses of process, because one very material part of the petition remains undisposed of. It is part of the petition that the respondents shall be made liable for the expense to which the petitioners may be put in restoring the wall in question to the status quo ante. The defenders have declined to restore, and the petitioners have been authorised by the Court to restore, in consequence of that refusal, at the sight of a civil engineer of eminence. No doubt when that work is carried out the petitioners will ask decree for the expense of that work against defenders, and the appropriate time to deal with the question of expenses of process is when the substantive cravings of the petition have been exhausted."

may think necessary, but supersedes extract hereof for fourteen days No. 147. from this date." *

The Caledonian Railway Company then raised the present note of suspension and interdict. They stated that they were threatened to be charged at the instance of Cochran's trustees under one or more of the decrees of 9th December 1895 and 19th February 1897 (above quoted), and craved the Court "simpliciter to suspend the said pretended decrees and charge, and whole grounds and warrants thereof; and further, to suspend the proceedings complained of, and to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents, Cochran's trustees and Alexander Morton, or either of them, or any person authorised by them, or either of them, from entering the complainers' premises at Finnieston Street, Glasgow, and from taking possession of, trespassing on, or otherwise interfering with any part of the said premises, including the retaining wall between the complainers' property and that belonging to the respondents Cochran's trustees on the south, and from restoring, altering, or executing any works whatsoever upon the said retaining wall, and from enforcing the said pretended decrees, and from acting under or carrying out the same in any manner of way, and to grant interim interdict to the effect above stated; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

In their statement of facts the Railway Company narrated the circumstances in which the wall had been erected, and the recesses in it constructed by them. They also, inter alia, stated, that for the purpose of bringing the Sheriff's judgment of 29th October 1896 under review of the Court of Session by appeal, they "moved the Court to dispose of the question of liability for expenses; but the Sheriff-substitute, on 11th November 1896, refused the complainers' motion, on the ground that, in his opinion, the question of expenses did not fall

* "NOTE.—I intimated at the Court that I proposed to consult Sheriff Berry as to the form of interlocutor to be pronounced, and to this course both agents assented. This interlocutor and note embody our joint views. The Court has held, rightly or wrongly, that pursuers are entitled to restore the retaining wall to the status quo ante defenders interfered with it. Defenders have refused to make that restoration, and pursuers have been authorised to do it; but with the object of minimising the inconvenience and loss to which the railway company may be put, a civil engineer of eminence, in whom the Court has confidence, has been nominated to superintend the work; and it is not to be doubted that, so far as consistent with the proper carrying out of the work, Mr Crouch will defer to the suggestions made by the railway company's engineer. It appears from the statements made that defenders have refused to allow pursuers' workmen to enter the defenders' premises for the purpose of doing the work which this Court has authorised. That is a thing, of course, which cannot be permitted, and this Court formally authorises possession of the retaining wall in question to be taken by a sheriff-officer of this Court, as representing the Court; and it is well it should be understood that interference with him by anyone in the duty entrusted to him may be taken up and dealt with as a criminal offence. It will be his duty to see that the pursuers' contractor and workmen get access to the premises, and he will report to the Court any interference by anyone which may have the effect of preventing this. . . . No opinion is expressed as to the competency of a note of suspension of this interlocutor, but that defenders may, if so advised, present a note of suspension to the Court of Session, extract of this interlocutor is superseded for a fortnight."

No. 147. May 21, 1897. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Cochran's Trustees.

to be dealt with until after the work of restoration had been completed. Notwithstanding this, the present complainers proposed to appeal the interlocutors of 9th December 1895 and 29th October 1896, but the Sheriff-clerk refused to allow them to note an appeal."

They further averred that they were "desirous of bringing the said interlocutors under review before the existing state of matters is interfered with, as the proposed restoration of the wall would cause great injury to the complainers and the public using their railway, and the present application has accordingly been rendered necessary."

They pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) At all events, in the circumstances condescended on, the respondents are not entitled to enforce the said decree or carry out the same, and the complainers are entitled to suspension and suspension and interdict as craved.

On 27th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills ordered intimation, and meantime sisted execution, and granted interim interdict.

Answers were lodged by Cochran's Trustees.

They pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) In respect of the said Sheriff Court proceedings condescended on, the present application is premature and incompetent. (3) The said decrees having been legally and properly pronounced, and being in accordance with the rights of parties, the note should be refused. (4) The complainers' interference with the said retaining wall being outwith their rights, and in violation of the rights of the respondents, the note should be refused.

On 13th March 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Passes the note without caution, and continues the sist and interim interdict."*

* "OPINION.— . . . The suspension now brought proceeds as upon a threatened charge. This would have been appropriate if the Railway Company had been ordered to restore the wall ; but it is doubtful whether any charge would be competent upon these interlocutors. However, the interlocutors are certainly being put in execution through the warrants which have been granted ; and, assuming the suspension to be otherwise competent, I see no objection to the form of it.

"The respondents challenge it as incompetent, on the ground that it is substantially an attempt to review interlocutors in a case where review is excluded by the statute. The complainers do not dispute that neither of the interlocutors is reviewable at this stage ; but they say that their purpose is not review, but a sist of execution until they are in a position to appeal on the merits. This distinction received effect in the case of Wilson v. Bartholomew (1860, 22 D. 1410) ; and, in my opinion, that case rules the present.

"In passing the note and continuing the interim interdict, I desire to make it quite clear what, according to my opinion, is the question, and the only question, for decision under this note, and what are the limits within which I hold such procedure competent. The question I take to be this,—whether it is more expedient or more in accordance with justice that the proposed restoration of the wall should now proceed, or should await the result of an appeal.

"It will be observed that that question can be determined without touching in any way the merits of the Sheriff Court action. It is not quite so obvious that it can be determined without touching the merits of the two interlocutors sought to be suspended. But the point is, whether a stay of execution involves the review of either interlocutor ; and it seems to me that it does not. On the contrary, I assume that the Sheriff was quite right in pronouncing both interlocutors ; that they followed from his previous decision as to interdict ; and that he could not have done otherwise than he Thereafter, on 24th March 1897, Cochran's Trustees presented a note to the Sheriff-substitute, and moved him to deal with the Sheriff Court expenses of process in order that they might have a judgment on the merits which could be appealed for review in the ordinary course, but the Sheriff-substitute refused the motion, for the reasons stated by him in the note to his interlocutor of 11th November 1896. Cochran's Trustees then reclaimed against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and argued;—It was not competent to appeal against the Sheriff's judgment, as the question of expenses had not been dealt with by him, and his judgment was therefore not a did. But inasmuch as an appeal from the final judgment will bring up for review all prior interlocutors, it is certain that the interlocutors now in question may ultimately be submitted for review; and the question now is, not whether they are right, or whether they should be reviewed, but whether their execution should be sisted, in order to enable them to be effectively reviewed when the time comes.

"In certain classes of cases it is obvious that this power must exist in the Bill-Chamber. Interim warrant may be granted in the Sheriff Court to do something absolutely irreparable, such as the cutting down of timber; and, if the Appellate Court should ultimately reverse on the merits, it would find itself powerless to give an effective decree. The same may be said of operations not in themselves irreparable, but so expensive or so risky that justice and common sense alike demand that they should await the result of an appeal. On the other hand, there is a large class of cases where the thing ordered to be done is so trivial, or so easily restored against, that it is not worth while to stop it, and where its execution would not hamper an Appellate Court in dealing with the whole case as it saw fit.

"Between these extremes there lie a large number of cases, each of which must be judged of according to its circumstances; and, in my opinion, this is one of them. When the parties meet on a closed record, it will be seen whether the sist should be continued, and on what conditions. Beyond that, I do not, as at present advised, see that there will be any question to try, though the complainers may state such objections as they can, so long as they do not involve review on the merits. The complainers indeed set forth in this note their position on the merits of the Sheriff Court litigation, and none of their pleas in law expresses the ground on which, and on which alone, I think the note should be passed. If this is not remedied at the next stage, the note may have to be refused. But meantime the reasons of suspension seem to me to be capable of being read as presenting a competent and relevant case for interference on the limited ground I have mentioned.

"It was suggested that this may lead to a dead-lock; and indeed it would do so if any step necessary towards an appealable judgment in the Sheriff Court were rendered impossible by the suspension of the warrants. If, for example, the Sheriff were not in a position to dispose of the case so as to let in an appeal, without ascertaining and decerning for the expense of restoring the wall, the case might be hung up indefinitely. But this is not so. The statute, as expounded in the case of Malcolm v. M'Intyre (1877, 5 R. 22), seems to admit of an appeal even before such steps have been taken, provided the expenses of process have been disposed of by a finding. The Sheriff-substitute indeed declined to deal with expenses of process until he had disposed of the liability of the Company for the expenses to which the trustees may be put in restoring the wall. But he has not been asked by either party (so far as the process discloses) to pronounce a finding as to liability for the expenses of restoration. If that were now done and the other statutory conditions of appeal were observed, the somewhat protracted dispute would speedily come to an end."

No. 147. final judgment.¹ The present note of suspension was really an attempt to get the merits of his judgment submitted to review, but that was incompetent. In any case the note should be refused. Otherwise matters would be brought to a dead-lock, because of the refusal of the Sheriff to deal with expenses until after the wall had been restored, and of the impossibility of restoration if execution were sisted. In these circumstances to pass the note would inflict a great hardship on the respondents, who held the Sheriff's judgment, and were therefore presumably right on the merits. The circumstances of the case were entirely different from those in Wilson v. Bartholomew.² In any event the Court should hear parties on the merits, or remit to the Sheriff to make a finding as to expenses.

Argued for the Railway Company ;—They concurred in asking the Court to hear the parties on the merits. If that were not competent, then the Court should pass the note. There was a proper question to be tried, viz., whether execution should be sisted or not. The suspension was not brought to have the judgment of the Sheriff reviewed on the merits, but to stay execution until parties were in a position to appeal on the merits. In the case of an interim order ad factum praestandum, an appeal was incompetent, and the only course open to the railway company therefore was to bring a suspension.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—Two courses are before the Court, to adhere to the interlocutor passing the note, or to recall the interlocutor and refuse the note.

It appears to me that the case of *Bartholomew*² is sufficient to support the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. In the Bill-Chamber it is enough to shew that there is a question to be tried, and that being so, I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

The Court would gladly aid the parties in having the merits decided, and grant the motion made if that were possible, but we must have a question to decide and be able to pronounce an operative judgment.

In the present case, as I have said, there are but two alternatives, and I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—The alternatives are to pass the note or to refuse it. Now, we do not refuse a note unless we think that there is no question to try, and we think that there is a rather serious question to try here. In passing the note, we are, in my opinion, following the authority of the case of Bartholomew.²

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with what has been said by your Lordships, that there is a proper question to be tried, and that is enough to warrant us in passing the note. But the Lord Ordinary has gone somewhat further, for it is not unusual in passing a note to express an opinion as to the grounds for doing so. Now, his Lordship has pointed out the inconvenience, the possible hardship, which might result to the Caledonian Railway Company if the order which has been made against them were carried into execution before the company has had an opportunity of bringing that order under review. Nothing has been said that tends to displace in my mind the impression made by what his Lordship says, and while we can do no more than pass the note I should hope that it will not be necessary to rehear the case on the question of the proper procedure, but that the parties will accept Lord Pearson's view that there are grounds for staying execution on the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute until the merits of the case can be brought competently before the Court by appeal.

Roissard v.
Scott's
Trustees.

Reparation—Damages for delay in payment of money—Interest.—A widow raised an action against testamentary trustees for payment of £11,000, as damages on the ground that heritable properties belonging to her had been brought to a forced sale through the fault of the defenders in withholding payment of sums due to her.

The pursuer averred that if she had received payment of £400 in March 1893 the forced sale would not have been necessary, and that she then applied to the law-agents of the trustees "for such sums as would enable her to pacify her pressing creditors." That no notice was taken of the application, and that the estates were sold; that in 1894 she received a letter from these law-agents stating that since May 1870 they had held a sum of £1250 belonging to the pursuer. The pursuer further averred that in January 1894 her claim for that sum and interest was compromised for £3000. The pursuer did not aver that she had informed the trustees or their law-agents, or that they knew, that if the money was not paid in 1893 the pursuer's estates would be brought to a forced sale.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kincairney) (1) that the action was not relevant, as the pursuer had not set forth circumstances inferring liability on the part of the defenders for damages for delay other than interest; and (2) that the pursuer's acceptance of interest excluded the claim for damages.

ON 6th November 1896 Elizabeth Isabella Johnstone Gordon, ^{1ST DIVISION.} Baroness Roissard de Bellet, raised an action of damages for £11,000 ^{Lord Kin-} against the trustees of her first husband, the late Major Hugh Scott ^{cairney.} of Gala, who had died in 1877. In 1878 she had married the Baron Roissard de Bellet, who died in 1891.

The pursuer averred that in 1891 she was possessed of properties in France, in the purchase and improvement of which she had expended above £16,000. (Cond. 5) That immediately before the Baron's death "a number of large mortgages affecting these properties were cleared off by the sale of a large villa and ground near Hyères, but there remained a number of merchants, tradesmen, and others, with unsatisfied claims of small amount, and these smaller creditors pressed the pursuer for immediate payment. The pursuer consulted M. Paget, a notary at Hyères, with a view to seeing what could be

No. 148. done to meet these claims and the arrears of interest due on certain small mortgages secured on the said properties. M. Paget stated that with a sum of £400 he could satisfy pursuer's creditors and avert a sale of her estates. M. Paget, at the request of the English Consul, M. Jouve, undertook to arrange with pursuer's creditors to delay taking legal proceedings for enforcing their claims for six months, and also a delay of one year to redeem pursuer's gallery of oil paintings, bronzes, and works of art pledged by the late Baron Roissard to M. Crevelli for 6000 francs (£240). As the result of the pursuer's consultation with M. Paget in March 1893, the pursuer, the said M. Jouve, Mr Chapman, banker, Hyères, and the Rev. C. Panter, D.D., English clergyman, on pursuer's behalf, made repeated application to her sons, the said Mr John Scott of Gala, and Mr Hugh Scott MacDougall of Makerstoun, and to Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, W.S., Edinburgh, the law-agents for the trustees and executors of the said deceased Hugh Scott (who had in their possession at this time a considerable sum of money belonging to the pursuer) for such a sum as would enable pursuer to pacify her pressing creditors. The letters addressed to the pursuer's sons were forwarded to the said Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, but said letters and the requests contained therein were totally disregarded by all these parties, the pursuer receiving no reply of any kind. In consequence of no moneys being forthcoming, the pursuer's heritable properties in France and her valuable gallery of oil paintings and bronzes were brought to sale by her creditors, and were sold for what could be obtained immediately." (Cond. 6) "The foregoing properties, having been brought to a forced sale, realised much less than their real value, and the pursuer has suffered great loss and damage in consequence. In particular, the property of La Tuilerie, which, had it been judiciously and voluntarily realised, would have brought not less than £7000, was sold for £1250." Similar statements were made in regard to other properties. "The occasion when pursuer's said properties were disposed of was not favourable for selling in the south of France, properties being then diminishing in value. Shortly thereafter prices improved, and they are now, and shortly after the date of said sales were, greatly higher than at the time when the pursuer was forced to put them in the market. . . ." (Cond. 7) "After the sale of pursuer's properties, which she bought for about £17,000 and sold for £3200, the pursuer, finding herself without means of support, returned to Scotland, and applied to her sons and to her daughter, and to the defenders, the trustees and executors of the late Major Scott, for aliment," and ultimately raised against them an action of aliment. (Cond. 8) "On the date of the calling of the said action for aliment (10th January 1894), the pursuer's law-agents received a letter from Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, intimating that during the whole period, since May 1870, the said Hugh Scott, and after his death his trustees and executors, had held the sum of £1250 belonging to the pursuer. They then offered, on behalf of the defenders, to make payment of this sum, together with interest at 6 per cent, which they had received from May 1870 to May 1875, amounting to £374, with the further addition of £247 of interest received on the same sum from July 1875 to July 1879, and to allow bank deposit rates from July 1879 to date of offer of payment, under deduction of income-tax. This offer was declined, and the pursuer's agents demanded an explanation of the retention of the said sum of £1250. After some correspondence, they learned that the fund in question had been originally lent to Lord Belhaven at 6 per cent; that it had been uplifted from that investment by Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, as Major Scott's law-agents, in May 1875, and thereafter invested by them, on Major Scott's behalf, in the Credit Foncier of Mauritius, where it remained from July 1875 to July 1879. It was then uplifted by Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, and retained by them, as agents for Major Scott's trustees, until the calling of the summons for aliment, when, as already explained, intimation was for the first time given that the defenders were prepared to make payment of this sum, with interest as aforesaid, to the pursuer." (Cond. 9) "In view of the peculiar circumstances in which the fund had been retained, the pursuer instructed her agents to insist upon payment of the interest accumulated thereon at full legal rates, but as pursuer was obliged to leave this country for France, where certain business matters were requiring her immediate attention, a compromise was effected on the question of interest, and the defenders, through the said Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, paid to her the said sum of £1250 and interest, in all £3000, on or about 24th January 1894. If this sum had been paid to the pursuer at the time when the defenders were informed that her creditors were pressing her, it would have obviated the sale of pursuer's French properties." (Cond. 10) " . . . Had the pursuer had command of the sum of £400 at the time of the threatened foreclosing of the mortgages on her French properties she would have been able to pay off the creditors' claims and to have postponed the sale until such time as the property market improved, or until she was able to make other arrangements for borrowing the money, or in any event, by obtaining time to bring the properties judiciously and voluntarily to sale, she would have secured a much larger price for them than she did. The properties, if judiciously realised as aforesaid, would have brought not less than £14,500, and the pursuer has accordingly lost a sum of not less than £11,000, which is the sum sued for." (Cond. 11) "For the loss the pursuer has sustained the defenders, as trustees and executors fore-said, and as individuals, are responsible to the pursuer. They retained in their own hands, or, at any rate, their agents, for whom they are responsible, held for them, money which they knew or ought to have known, or which their said agents knew or ought to have known, belonged to the pursuer, and though repeated applications were made to them therefor, the purpose of the application explained, and the consequences to the pursuer if the money was refused to her clearly pointed out to them, they took no notice of her letters, and refused or delayed to make payment of such sum to her. In consequence of the unwarrantable, illegal, and malicious conduct on the part of the defenders, great loss and damage has been sustained by the pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, she is entitled to reparation therefor. (2) The sum sued for being reasonable compensation in the circumstances considered on, the pursuer is entitled to decree therefor.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The pursuer having been paid interest on the said sum of £1250, and having discharged the defenders of all claims therefor, has no

Roissard v.
Scott's
Trustees.

On 23d February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the averments of the pursuer irrelevant to support the conclusions of the summons, and therefore sustains defenders' first plea in law: Sustains also the defenders' third plea in law, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the summons." *

* "OPINION.—This is an action of damages by the Baroness de Bellet, at one time the wife of the late Major Hugh Scott of Gala, who died in 1877. The defenders are his trustees. The sum claimed is £11,000, and the ground of claim seems to be, that because of the defender's delay in paying to the pursuer a sum of £1250 belonging to her, which was in their hands, certain properties belonging to her were sold by or through the pressure of her creditors, at a sacrifice, whereby she suffered loss to the amount sued for.

"It does not appear precisely how that sum came into the defenders' hands, nor what the character of their obligation to pay it was, nor the reason why it was not paid earlier. On these points the condescendence and the defences are alike unsatisfactory. But at present I am not concerned with the defences, but only with the condescendence, because the defenders have maintained, and I think successfully, that it is wholly irrelevant. I have formed that opinion (1) because of the obscurity and incompleteness, and what I may call the incoherence of the pursuer's averments, and (2) because liability for the damages claimed does not, under the circumstances averred, follow from the defenders' delay in payment. I think also that the defenders' third plea is well founded, and that the pursuer's claim for damages has been satisfied, and that the present action is excluded by the admitted payment to her, on 24th January 1894, of the £1250, with interest.

"The pursuer's averments relate, firstly, to the damage sustained, and secondly, to her applications to the defenders. On the first point she avers that after Major Scott's death she married the Baron de Bellet, who died on 6th December 1891; that she was then possessed of properties, in the purchase and improvement of which she had expended above £16,000; that immediately before the baron's death 'a number of large mortgages affecting these properties were cleared off'; but that she had still a number of creditors for small amounts; and 'in consequence of no moneys being forthcoming, the pursuer's heritable properties in France and her valuable gallery of oil paintings and bronzes were brought to sale by her creditors, and were sold for what could be obtained immediately.' She states that a property worth £7000 was sold for £1250, another property worth £5000 for £1250, and a third worth £2500 for £1000. As I read condescendences 5 and 10, the pursuer's averment is that these properties were sacrificed because she could not raise £400, and that had she received that sum the sale of her estates could have been averted. But if it be true, as she avers, that large mortgages affecting her properties had been cleared off, and if it be true that the creditors agreed to delay proceedings for six months, as she also avers, how can it be true that she was unable to raise £400 on security of these properties? I suppose that in considering relevancy I am bound to make an effort to assume the truth of the pursuer's averment; but still it is so nearly incredible, and so completely unaccountable, as to throw on the pursuer the obligation of explaining distinctly, specifically, and in detail, how it was that she was unable to raise £400, and so to prevent the sale of her properties. There is no such explanation, and therefore I hold that her averments on that matter are not such as can be sent to proof. Farther, the dates of the sales of the pursuer's properties are not given, and they may have been, for anything that is clearly stated on record, before any application was made to the defenders or their agents."

"With regard to these applications, it appears from condescendence 3

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The action was relevant. The No. 148.
 pursuer had averred that the defenders knew, or ought to have known, that they held in their hands money belonging to her ; that she had May 21, 1897.

 payment of it, she would not have had to sell her properties in France Scott's money, and were liable in damages for the loss resulting from their actings. No doubt in the ordinary case, where special damage could not be qualified, the damage due for delay in payment of money was the interest only. But where, as here, special damage had been shewn, the damages due were not so limited, but included the whole damage flowing from the wrong done.¹

That damage was just such as naturally, in the circumstances, resulted from the defenders' actings.²

The defenders were not called upon.

that the pursuer did not know of the existence of this fund in the defenders' hands, and from condescendence 5 I gather that the applications were made after March 1893. They were not made to the defenders, but it is averred that they were made to their law-agents. They could not have been applications for money due to the pursuer, as she did not know that any money was due. What is of more consequence is, that the pursuer does not aver that she informed the defenders' agents that her property was about to be sold for want of money, nor that she mentioned the amount required. She only avers that application was made for such a sum as would pacify pressing creditors. It is true that in condescendence 11 there is a general averment that repeated applications were made for money due to the pursuer (which is, of course, impossible if she did not know that any was due), that 'the purpose of the application' was 'explained, and the consequences to the pursuer, if the money was refused to her, clearly pointed out to them.' But it is not said what purposes or what consequences were disclosed ; and I cannot hold that this general averment adds anything to the more specific averment in condescendence 5. I think, therefore, that it is not relevantly averred that the defenders were informed that the consequences of non-compliance with her requests for money would be the forced sale of the pursuer's properties.

"In the ordinary case the damage due for delay in payment of money is nothing but interest. 'Here interest is the damage due.'—Bell's Pr., sec. 32 ; Fletcher v. Taylor, 2d November 1855, 25 L. J., C. P. 65. That is the only damage which in the ordinary case a debtor and creditor have in view, and which, generally speaking, is the only damage recoverable. That general rule seems to hold whether damages are claimed for breach of contract or ex delicto. In this case the want of all averment as to the conditions under which the defenders held the pursuer's money makes it difficult, if not impossible, to say under what head this claim comes.
 There is no contract averred. At the same time it is not alleged that the defenders held the money as trustees for the pursuer. They were, in fact, not trustees for the pursuer. Counsel for the pursuer stated that he preferred to put his case on the delict of the defenders. But here again he has not alleged any delict or fault. Fault is mentioned generally in the first plea in law ; but not, so far as I have noticed, in the condescendence. But whether the pursuer's claim is rested on breach of contract or on delict, it

Scott's

LORD YOUNG.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action, and I am of opinion that his judgment is right, on the grounds very fully and clearly stated in his note. I think that the defenders might, and possibly ought, to have ascertained after the trust-estate came into their possession that this sum of £1250 in their hands belonged to the pursuer, and that they might, and possibly ought, to have informed her sooner that they had the money; but I am not able from the statements made by her on record to impute to them any actionable culpa involving them in a claim of damages. It would require a case very emphatically shewing culpa to entitle the owner of money in the possession of another, who has never been asked to hand it over, to damages beyond interest from such a holder. I do not think such a case has been stated here. I have said that the defenders might, and possibly ought, to have ascertained sooner than they did that money belonging to the pursuer was in their possession, but I also think that the pursuer might, and possibly ought, to have ascertained that money belonging to her was in the hands of her first husband's trustees. I concur in the is nothing but a claim of damages for failure to fulfil in due time an obligation to pay money, and it can only, apart from special circumstances, be for such damages as might fairly and naturally be held to flow, according to the usual course of things, from failure to implement the obligation, and that, when the obligation is to pay money, can only be for interest (besides the principal). Nor will a debtor in such a case be subjected to additional liability for damage arising on account of special circumstances unless these special circumstances are fully disclosed to him.—See Hayley v. Bazendale, 6 Exch. 341; British Columbian Sawmill Company v. Nettleship, 1868, L. R., 3 C. P. 497; Mayne on Damages, p. 11, et seq. The pursuer referred to Robin v. Steward, 1854, 14 C. B. (Scott's) 595, in which a bank was held liable in damages for dishonouring a bill of a customer who had money in bank. There damage was allowed for injury to credit. But that case has little application. It may shew that in certain circumstances a claim for damages other than interest may arise from failure to pay money. That may be so, if the special circumstances and their bearing on the failure to pay be known to and appear to have been in the contemplation of the parties; and in this case, if it had been averred that the defenders were certified that the pursuer's property was in peril, and would be sold at a great loss if a sum demanded were not paid, it may be that there might have been a case for inquiry, had not payment of the whole debt with interest been made and accepted. But as above explained, I think the pursuer has not made any sufficient averment to that effect. I am therefore of opinion that the general rule applies, and that interest is the only damage due.

"Farther, it seems to me that the payment of the £1250 with interest is conclusive against the pursuer. £1250 with £1750 of interest was paid and accepted on 24th January 1894, and it is not averred that any claim on account of failure to pay at an earlier date was reserved. The payment of the interest was undoubtedly a payment of damages for delay in payment, and it was accepted as damage for that delay; and no reservation of right to claim additional damage being made, it was clearly accepted as the whole damage.

"I apprehend that when the defenders made that payment their obligation, whether it was of the nature of contract or not, was fulfilled; and that the pursuer cannot now claim damages on the ground of failure to fulfil it. On this short ground I think the defenders are in any case entitled to prevail. It is expressed in the defenders' third plea, and I see no good answer to it. I shall therefore find that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and shall further sustain the defenders' third plea in law."

conclusion which the Lord Ordinary has arrived at, and on the grounds No. 148. stated by him, that there is here no relevant claim for damages.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think that the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary are sufficient to support the findings in his interlocutor. I would only observe that the cases quoted by Mr Abel are cases of breach of contract, and therefore cannot relevantly be considered in deciding the present.

Burgh—Revision of boundaries of wards—Proof of expediency—Sheriff—Burgh Police Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), secs. 11 and 13.—The Burgh Police Act, 1892, enacts by sec. 11 that on the application of the Commissioners or of the Council of any burgh, and after publication in the Gazette, and “such other notice and inquiry as he may deem necessary,” the Sheriff may, after hearing parties interested, revise the boundaries of the wards in the burgh, and increase or lessen their number. Section 13 enacts, that any owner or occupier who considers himself aggrieved by the deliverance of the Sheriff, may appeal to the Court of Session, and “the Court . . . may either pronounce a final order or remit to a Lord Ordinary to direct inquiry into the circumstances of the case. . . .”

Held that the power given to the Sheriff by section 11 is administrative, and not judicial, and that he is not entitled to grant an application to alter the boundaries of a burgh in respect of no opposition, but only if tota re perspecta he considers it expedient to do so.

In March 1897 the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of 1ST DIVISION. Leith presented a petition to the Sheriff of the Lothians to “revise, alter, and readjust the boundaries of the wards of the said burgh for the purposes of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and for all parliamentary and municipal purposes . . . and to define in a written deliverance the new boundaries of the wards of the said burgh in manner following, viz. :— . . .” *

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), enacts, sec. 11,—“Upon the application of the Commissioners or of the Council of any burgh, and after publication in the Edinburgh Gazette, and in any newspaper published in such burgh . . . and such other notice and inquiry as he may deem necessary, it shall be lawful for the Sheriff, after hearing all parties interested, from time to time to revise . . . the boundaries of such burgh for the purposes of this Act . . . and where in any burgh wards exist at present the Sheriff may increase their number or lessen their number, by combination or rearrangement; and the Sheriff shall define in a written deliverance on such application the new boundaries of such burgh and wards for the purposes of this Act, and such deliverance, unless appealed against in manner hereinafter provided, shall be final, and when recorded along with the application on which it proceeds in the Sheriff Court Books of the county, shall fix and determine the boundaries of such burgh and wards for the purposes of this Act. . . . Lindsay v.
Leith.

On 25th March 1897 the Sheriff (Rutherford) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the foregoing petition, appoints intimation of the import thereof, and of this deliverance, to be forthwith made by advertisement once in the Edinburgh Gazette, Leith Burghs Pilot, and Leith Observer; and further directs notice to be made by handbills posted in and around the burgh of Leith: Directs the petition and relative plans to lie in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk at Edinburgh, for the inspection of all concerned, for ten days after the date of said advertisement: Requires all parties interested who may desire to oppose the petition, or to be heard in reference thereto, to lodge in the hands of the said Clerk of Court at Edinburgh, within the said ten days, a notice of appearance, with certification."

No answers were lodged, and on 14th April 1897 the Sheriff pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition and relative productions, in respect no appearance has been made to oppose the prayer of the petition being granted, defines the new boundaries of the wards of the burgh of Leith for the purposes of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and for all parliamentary and municipal purposes," in accordance with the scheme suggested by the petitioners.

On the 28th April a petition was presented to the First Division by William Bruce Lindsay and others, owners and occupiers of property within the first ward, craving the Court "to recall the deliverance of the Sheriff complained of, and refuse the petition of the Town-Council, or otherwise to remit to any Lord Ordinary to direct inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and to issue such order thereupon as he may deem requisite to determine the boundaries of the wards of said burgh."

The petitioners stated that the proposed alterations of the boundaries of the first ward were quite unnecessary, and, in any event, unsatisfactory, and not calculated to meet the purpose of the proposers.

"The first ward has long held the position of premier ward in the burgh, and said petitioners object to the said scheme as being not only, for the above reasons, unnecessary and inexpedient, but as Sheriffs, in revising the boundaries of a burgh, shall take into account the number of dwelling-houses within the area proposed to be included, the density of the population, and all the circumstances of the case, whether it properly belongs to and ought to form part of the burgh, and should in their judgment be included therein. . . ."

Sec. 13, provides that any owner or occupier who considers himself aggrieved by the deliverance of the Sheriff may, within fourteen days, present a petition to the Court of Session setting forth the grounds on which he objects, and the Court may "either pronounce a final order or remit to a Lord Ordinary to direct inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and to issue such order thereupon as he may deem requisite to determine the boundaries of such burgh. . . ."

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 58), sec. 13, subsec. 6, enacts, that sec. 11 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act is to be construed as including the revision of boundaries for parliamentary and municipal as well as for police purposes.

tending to deprive the ward of the influence it has hitherto exercised in municipal affairs." No. 149.

The Magistrates and Town-Council lodged answers, in which they maintained the propriety and expediency of the proposed readjustment of the boundaries. May 22, 1897.
Lindsay v.
Magistrates of Leith.

The petitioners argued ;—The Sheriff had proceeded as if acting in his judicial capacity, whereas he had to perform a purely administrative duty. That clearly appeared from the phraseology of his interlocutor. Accordingly he had pronounced the deliverance without inquiry, and without applying his mind to the expediency of the proposed alterations. The judgment should have been pronounced causa cognita. It was in effect a decree in absence. The facts set forth in cond. 9 of the Magistrates' petition were not accurate. The proposed treatment of the first ward was unjustifiable, and would have the effect of transferring a large section of the mercantile community into what was essentially an artisan ward.

Argued for the Magistrates and Town-Council ;—The petitioners, two of whom were in the town-council, had ample notice and knowledge of the application to the Sheriff, and they should have opposed it before him. Their failure to do so was not due to inadvertence. The Sheriff was entitled to take into consideration the fact that, out of 14,000 ratepayers or interested persons, not one appeared to oppose the application. That, together with the Sheriff's local knowledge, made a formal inquiry by him unnecessary. The considerations now advanced were purely sentimental, and were not relevant to justify any further inquiry. The Court was quite entitled to refuse the prayer for inquiry, and to pronounce a final order.

LORD PRESIDENT.—By section 11 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892, power is given to the Sheriff to revise the boundaries of the wards of burghs. He is to be moved to do so by the Council or Commissioners of any burgh, and it is quite plain from the terms of sections 11 and 13, and also from the subject-matter of these sections, that the Sheriff is exercising an administrative power in altering boundaries, and he is only bound to do so if satisfied that a change is expedient. The selection of the Sheriff was of course made on the ground that he was the local Judge, necessarily having an extensive acquaintance with the community whose interests were involved, and his duty is to preserve the status quo, unless reason is shewn for the alteration.

In the present case, after advertisement had been made of the application to have these wards altered, no answers were put in. The Sheriff, when he came to resume consideration of the application, was no doubt quite entitled to have in view as an element supporting the application that there was no opposition ; but that did not, in my opinion, absolve him from the duty of satisfying himself that the alteration was expedient, although it might make that duty more easy. But his judgment in so many words discloses that he proceeded on the fact that no appearance had been made to oppose the application. His judgment says so. I am unable to regard that as a judgment, tota re perspecta, on a full consideration of the merits and demerits of the proposal.

Certain persons now come forward by petition to this Court who say that they are aggrieved by that judgment, that the change made by the order is unnecessarily far-reaching, that the redress of the balance of the burgh, with a view to the increased representation assigned to it, might have been effected without touching the ward they were interested in, and that they object to the change as altogether unnecessary.

Now, it seems to me that even assuming that these objections rest partly on a feeling of objection to change, and of attachment to old associations, that is the kind of thing that the Sheriff is bound to consider, and that he was not excluded from weighing it by what has been offered on the other side. The question then is, are we to shut the door to persons who come forward alleging more strongly than I have stated the objections I have mentioned? Our duty is to remit to a Lord Ordinary to direct an inquiry.

The proper order will be [See interlocutor].

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. Nothing can be clearer than that the duty which the Sheriff has to perform here is administrative, and not in any sense judicial. The duty imposed upon him by statute is to satisfy himself that the proposed alterations were necessary, and that the method proposed was the most expedient.

Now, I agree that looking not only at the interlocutor, but at the whole case, it appears that the Sheriff thought that he was acting in a judicial capacity, and that no person appearing to oppose he was entitled to decide the question as if he were pronouncing a decree in absence in a personal litigation, because he says,—(Quotes Sheriff's interlocutor).

In the face of that expression, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the Sheriff came to form his opinion without making any inquiry to satisfy his mind not only that the change was necessary, but that the mode of change proposed was the best. I agree with Mr Salvesen that a change of some sort is probably necessary, but still the question is, how is it best to be effected, having regard to the existing interests and feeling on the subject? That is what the Sheriff should have applied his mind to, and as far as I can judge he has not performed this duty.

What, then, is our position? I think we are just in the position in which the Sheriff was originally, and I can quite understand that even if the Sheriff had not applied his mind, as I think he ought to have done, we might, if we were satisfied, after fully hearing parties, that no further inquiry was necessary, pronounce a final order. But my view is that, sitting as it were as the Sheriff in the first instance, I could not dispose of the application without further inquiry, and that inquiry we cannot under the Act conduct ourselves. The only course open to us is to do as your Lordship suggests, to remit to a Lord Ordinary to direct inquiry into the circumstances.

LORD M'LAREN.—In all questions as to the determination or alteration of the powers of Local Authorities, or as to the enlargement of local areas, it is the settled practice that variations shall be made only after evidence as to their desirability shall have been produced, to the satisfaction of the authorities by whom the order is to be made. Sometimes it is by Parliament itself, as when a private bill is promoted for the purpose of consolidating, or enlarging, the area of a burgh. Sometimes, again, the order is by the Secretary for Scotland, on a report by the Sheriff, and sometimes by the Sheriff acting as a direct delegate of Parliament. Now, looking to the terms of the enactment giving powers to the Sheriff, there is no reason to suppose that it is intended that applications of this kind should be dealt with in a manner inconsistent with the established usage in all similar cases. On the contrary, it is plainly intended that the facts establishing the expediency of the proposed order should be brought to the notice of the Sheriff. The evidence required to satisfy the Sheriff does not necessarily take the form of a proof, but there must be evidence, formal or informal, to establish that the case has arisen for the exercise of the statutory power.

Lindsay v.
Magistrates of Leith.

Now, agreeing with your Lordships that the Sheriff's action in the matter cannot be sustained, it appears to me that this is a case for a remit to a Lord Ordinary. The statute deals with two cases, where the Court having all the materials for decision may pronounce a final order, and where not having them it must "remit to a Lord Ordinary to direct inquiry into the circumstances of the case." If the Sheriff had held an inquiry, and we had before us notes of evidence taken before him, or reports from skilled persons, there might have been no necessity for further inquiry; but having nothing of this kind before us, the proper course is to remit the case to a Lord Ordinary.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remit to Lord Stormonth-Darling to inquire into the circumstances of the case, and to issue such order as his Lordship may deem requisite to determine the boundaries of the wards of the burgh."

Trust—Resignation of Trustee—Nobile Officium.—Circumstances in which the Court authorised a testamentary trustee to resign office on repayment of a legacy he had received.

May 27, 1897.

ON 12th May 1897 Mr Thomas Henderson Orphoot, one of the trustees under the settlement of the late Sir James Naesmyth of Posso, Bart., presented a petition to the Court, craving power and authority to resign the office of trustee.

1ST DIVISION.

The petitioner stated that Sir James Naesmyth had died on 10th October 1896, and that the petitioner, along with two other trustees nominated by the testator, accepted office. The purposes of the trust were—(1) the payment of debts, &c.; (2) the payment of certain money legacies, including those in the following terms:—"To each of my trustees and executors (who may be willing to accept the office of trustee and executor) I leave one hundred guineas, free of legacy duty; (3) the disposal of certain articles as specific legacies"; (4) the payment to the testator's widow of the interest of the whole amount of the capital of the estate, and upon her death, the realisation of the capital and its payment in certain proportions to various charities.

The petitioner further stated that the testator's widow still survived, and that all parties interested in the petition offered no opposition to his being relieved of his office.

"That the total means and estate left by the truster amounted to upwards of £87,000, of which the greater portion was invested by the

No. 150. deceased on investments of a nature which the trustees are not entitled to retain, and that accordingly they have been, and are still, in the course of realising these to the best advantage with a view to the reinvestment of the funds on securities within their powers.”

May 27, 1897.
Orphoot.

“That your petitioner accepted office in ignorance of the magnitude of the trust-estate, and of the time and labour required for the proper management of so large a fund. He now finds that his official duties, which are varied and laborious, prevent him from giving proper attention to the affairs of the trust. Your petitioner is Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles at Peebles. He has the whole duties of his office in Peebles to discharge. In addition, upon three days of each week he requires to sit in Edinburgh in the Sheriff Summary and Bankruptcy Courts of Midlothian. On these days he has also to dispose of the whole of the miscellaneous and administrative business falling to the Sheriff-substitutes of Midlothian, in so far as his time permits him to discharge that duty. Further, in each alternate month, in addition to the duties above mentioned, he sits in the Police Court of Edinburgh for three days of each week. These numerous and varied duties engross the whole of your petitioner's time. The result is that he cannot attend meetings of trustees, and that he is unable to bestow upon the multiplicity of questions which arise in connection with the large fund which the trustees require to administer, the time and consideration which these questions require. He is accordingly unable to discharge the duties of the office conferred upon him by the said trust-disposition and deed of settlement. It is not expedient in the interest of the trust that he should be obliged to remain in office. The trustees have only the statutory powers of investment. In these circumstances your petitioner desires to resign, and he makes this application to your Lordships for authority to do so. He has offered to repay the legacy of £105.

“That the trust not being a gratuitous one, the petitioner has no power to resign under the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861, and the trust-deed does not provide for his resignation, so that if the petitioner is to be relieved of the office of trustee he can only be so with the authority of your Lordships.”

Counsel for the petitioner cited in support of the petition the cases of Watson v. Crauccour, Feb. 17, 1844, 6 D. 687, per Lord Cuninghame, 16 Scot. Jur. 324, and Alison, Feb. 3, 1886, 23 S. L. R. 362, and was proceeding with his argument—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This application is made, is it not, on the distinct understanding that the legacy of 100 guineas is repaid?

Counsel answered in the affirmative.

THE COURT, without hearing further argument, granted the prayer of the petition.

Process—Suspension—Extrinsic Objection to judgment of inferior Court—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100).—It is not competent to set aside by way of suspension the decree of an inferior Court on the ground that it has been obtained by fraud.

Question, whether having regard to the provisions of the Court of Session

as a process of review.

ON 5th March 1894 Grace Stirling Kirkwood, with consent of her father, William Henry Kirkwood, raised an action of filiation and aliment in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against Andrew Smith, Lothian Bridge, Midlothian. Smith acknowledged the paternity of the child, and having consented to decree as concluded for being pronounced against him, he was decerned to pay £2, 2s. of inlying expenses and £7 per annum of aliment till the child, who was born in December 1893, should attain the age of fourteen.

May 28, 1897.
Smith v.
Kirkwood.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

On 26th July 1894 Kirkwood charged Smith to make payment in terms of the decree, and after a warrant to imprison had been presented against him, he was ordained, on 18th September 1894, on pain of imprisonment, to pay £3, 2s. within one week and 3s. weekly thereafter. The charge and petition for warrant to imprison thereon proceeded upon section 4 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), and section 4 of the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 42).

On 21st October 1896 Smith presented a note of suspension in the Bill-Chamber craving the Court to suspend the charge and warrant to imprison, and whole grounds and warrants thereof.

The note was passed of consent, and a record was made up.

The complainer averred that he had been induced to consent to decree against him in the Sheriff Court by certain false representations made to him by the pursuers. He further averred that he had paid the whole sums referred to in the warrant of imprisonment as they had become due.

The complainer pleaded ;—(1) The decree in said affiliation action having been obtained by means of the fraudulent representations and actings of the respondents, the charge and warrant to imprison following thereon are inept, and ought to be suspended.

Kirkwood and her father, as her curator-in-law, admitted the payments alleged, but denied the complainer's averments of fraud, and pleaded ;—(1) The complainer's statements are not relevant or sufficient to support the prayer of the note, and it ought to be dismissed.

On 29th January 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the first plea in law for the complainer cannot be entertained in the action, therefore repels said plea : Finds that it appears from the statement of parties that the sum charged for has been paid, therefore suspends said charge and warrant for imprisonment."

The complainer reclaimed, and argued ;—The note of suspension was competently directed against the decree upon which the charge (now exhausted) was given. No doubt the time for appealing against the Sheriff's judgment had long since elapsed, but suspension of that judgment was still open to the complainer. Inferior Court decrees pronounced in foro might be brought up for review either by reduction or by suspension, the latter being the proper remedy where a charge had followed.¹ The Court of Session Act, 1868, had not abolished review of such decrees by suspension.

Argued for the respondents ;—Suspension was no longer a competent mode of bringing under review inferior Court judgments.² In

No. 151. any view, the grounds of suspension here were extrinsic to the Sheriff Court process.

May 28, 1897.
Smith v.
Kirkwood.

LORD ADAM.—(After stating the facts his Lordship proceeded)—The only averment I find in the suspension is that the respondents on a petition following on the said charge obtained warrant of imprisonment, and that the sums referred to in the warrant have been paid, and accordingly that the warrant is entirely exhausted.

Now, as I understand, the complainer does not so much object to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor suspending that warrant, but he goes further, and says, —I want also in this suspension to have the original decree against me in the Sheriff Court set aside, and the ground upon which he wishes it to be set aside is that it was obtained fraudulently. I have always understood that to upset a decree on the ground of fraud is to introduce extrinsic matter, and that that can only be done by way of reduction. Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary seems to me to be quite right when he says that that plea cannot be entertained, and I think we should adhere.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with Lord Adam, and have little to add.

The first proposition maintained by Mr Anderson is that suspension of a charge with its warrant is a legal and competent mode of obtaining review of a decree upon its merits.

There was, no doubt, a period in the history of our process law when that proposition might have been affirmed. I think it is laid down in the institutional writers that decrees both of inferior Courts and of the Lords Ordinary might be reviewed by way of suspension.

I should desire to reserve my opinion upon the question how far such procedure would be still competent in view of the radical changes introduced by the Court of Session Act, 1868, in the mode of dealing with judgments of inferior Courts. But supposing the proposition to be well founded, it does not appear to me that any proper application of the kind is before us. We are not asked to review a judgment finding the defender liable for aliment on his own admission (which was the only matter before the Sheriff), but we are asked to set aside the decree upon grounds which were not before the Sheriff, and I fail to see how an application of the kind can be regarded as a mode of reviewing the decision of the Sheriff.

While the Lord Ordinary was no doubt quite entitled to suspend, no one opposing, he was, I think, also right in rejecting the complainer's first plea in law and the argument founded upon it.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with Lord M'Laren that it is unnecessary for the purpose of this case to consider how far the process of suspension of a final decree of an inferior Court is now available as a process of review. Assuming it to be so, I confess I should be disposed to read the note of suspension now before us as presenting to the Court, not an appeal against a judgment of the Sheriff on its merits, but a note of suspension of a charge for the purpose of staying diligence. However that may be, I think the true and sufficient ground of judgment is that which has been already stated. The charge and warrant of imprisonment complained of is a charge proceeding upon a warrant granted upon a petition to the Sheriff under the special provisions of the statute. The sum which the complainer has been charged to pay has now been paid, and therefore the warrant is exhausted because it has been satisfied, and that seems to me a perfectly sufficient ground for suspending a charge and warrant for imprisonment. But that being done, the only ground on which we are asked to consider anything further upon the complainer's application is that the decree which was obtained against him was obtained by fraud of the pursuer of the action. That is not a ground of review of the Sheriff's judgment on its merits, but a reason for setting aside the judgment on grounds altogether extrinsic to the process. I agree that this is not a competent process for raising any such question.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Reparation—Landlord and Tenant—Defective Premises—Emerging Defect—Rotten Stair—Relevancy.—The wife of a tenant of a house was injured by falling through a wooden stair in the house, and in an action of damages at her instance against the landlord she averred that her husband had been tenant of the house for thirty years; that the steps of the stair were after the accident discovered to be in a decayed, rotten, and ruinous condition; that the defender was personally aware of the dangerous state of the stair; that the pursuer's husband had frequently asked the defender to have the stair repaired, and that he had specially done so about a month before the accident, when the stair was inspected by the pursuer's factor.

The Court, holding that the averments disclosed a case for inquiry, allowed an issue for the trial of the cause.

Webster v. Brown, May 12, 1892, 19 R. 765, distinguished.

MRS AGNES HALL, wife of James Hall, tenant of a house and shop in Roxburgh Street, Kelso, sustained injuries by falling through a stair in the house, and raised this action, concluding for £500 as damages, against Mrs Jane Hubner, the proprietor of the subjects, and her husband.

Sheriff of Roxburghshire.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "In the month of September 1895, and for thirty years or thereby previous thereto, the said James Hall was one of the female defender's tenants in said property. . . . The wood which formed the steps of said stair was, when the injuries after received were sustained, discovered to be in a decayed, rotten, and ruinous condition." (Cond. 3) On the evening of 28th September 1895 the pursuer was in the course of going down the stair of the house. "When she had reached the middle of the stair, and when on the sixth step thereof counting from the bottom, that step, owing to its decayed, rotten, and ruinous state, suddenly and without any warning broke or gave way, and having no hand-rail or other means of checking her descent, she violently went down 3 feet 6 inches or thereby into a cellar below. and reckless neglect to have the stair referred to thoroughly repaired or entirely renewed. The staircase was in a defective and dangerous condition, and the defenders were personally well aware of the dangerous, dilapidated, and ruinous state of the stair. The said James Hall, the pursuer's husband, frequently complained to Mr Thomas David Crichton Smith, solicitor, Kelso, the defenders' factor at Kelso, to whom she entrusted the management of said property, and asked him to have the stair repaired or renewed; and specially did he do so in or about the month of August 1895, when Mr Robert Moodie Grieve, principal clerk to the said Mr Thomas David Crichton Smith, visited and inspected the said stair, and was then at least fully aware of the defective, ruinous, and dangerous state of the stair. . . . By her own culpable neglect, and that of her factor or agent, for whom she is responsible, the serious injuries to the pursuer took place."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The female defender being the owner of the stair and staircase in question, was and is legally bound to maintain it in a safe condition, and the pursuer's injuries having been caused through her failure to do so, she is liable in reparation.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant.

On 8th March 1897 the Sheriff-substitute (Baillie) sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Vary Campbell) recalled this interlocutor, and before answer allowed to both parties a proof of their averments.†

The defender appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff-substitute was right in holding that the case was ruled by Webster v. Brown.¹ The ground of judgment in that case was the continued occupation of the house in the face of obvious danger. The pursuer's averments made it clear that this was a case of a similar kind. The Sheriff was therefore wrong in treating this as a case of emerging defect. The other distinction suggested by him did not justify the action. The pursuer being the tenant's wife was either identical with him and the case of *Brown*¹ ruled the present, or she was a stranger to the landlord, and must seek her remedy, not against him, but against the tenant.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If I thought that this case was similar to that of Webster v. Brown,¹ I would arrive at the same result. But the circumstances

* "NOTE.— . . . I think it is clear from the pursuer's averments that for some time prior to the accident she was aware of the state of the stair, and that, knowing this, she and her husband chose to remain on in the occupation of the house. I am therefore of opinion that this case falls within the rule laid down in Webster v. Brown, 19 R. 765, and Shields v. Dalziel, 2d February 1897, 4 Scots Law Times, 257 [afterwards reversed in the Inner-House, supra, p. 847], and that I must hold her averments irrelevant."

† "NOTE.—I do not think that I can refuse an inquiry in this case. It does not appear to me that the case is ruled by the decisions referred to in the note of the Sheriff-substitute. The pursuer is not the tenant of the premises, and the defect alleged is an emerging defect, of which it is averred by the pursuer that notice was given to the landlord. I think the true basis of the case consists in distinct proof of culpa as against the landlord, and the defender has on record various pleas as to the knowledge or contributory negligence of the pursuer, which may yet become available upon the true state of facts being ascertained."

are different. In *Webster*¹ what happened was this: A tenant continued to use stone stairs leading to her house, which were so worn as to be obviously dangerous judged both by the eye and by the feeling of the foot, long after entering upon her tenancy, and did not take the course which was open to her of rejecting the tenancy. She knew the danger, because it was obvious to all, and, therefore, she was held to have taken the risk. Here the case is different. The stairs were of wood and had been used with safety for years, and to outward appearance may have been the same as before. But by constant use they had got into a state of decay, and had become not strong enough for the work they had to do. I think this is a case for inquiry. It may turn out that the landlord is not to blame, but I do not think that, in the circumstances stated on record, we can decide that she is not without inquiry.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. This house has been let to the same tenant for thirty years, the lease, I suppose, being renewed from year to year. I have no doubt that the house was let as being in tenable and habitable condition. A house is not necessarily uninhabitable merely because the surface of stairs therein is much worn by long use. But if the stairs become so rotten with age that they may give way at any moment the house ceases to be a tenable house, habitable with safety. It has got into an uninhabitable and discreditable condition. The present is, I think, a clear case for inquiry.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am also of opinion that there should be inquiry.

Process—Proof—Diligence to recover writings.—In an action of damages the ground of action averred by the pursuer was that the defender had refused to implement an award appointing him to retire certain bills of lading. The defender, besides disputing the validity of the award, denied liability on the ground that the goods covered by the bills were not conform to contract. The Lord Ordinary allowed the pursuer “a proof of his averments on record, and to the defenders a conjunct probation.” Held that the defender was not entitled to a diligence for the recovery of documents bearing upon the condition of the goods—evidence on that question being excluded by the terms of the order for proof.

Scott, Simpson, & Wallis v. Forrest & Turnbull.

THIS was an action at the instance of Scott, Simpson, & Wallis, 1st Division. merchants, London, against Forrest & Turnbull, merchants, Leith, Lord Kin- concluding for payment of £42, 1s. 4d. cairney.

The pursuers averred that on 6th August 1896 they sold to the defenders 400 bags of sugar known by the name of Russian crystals; that the contract between them contained a clause that “this contract is subject to the rules of the Refined Sugar Association, and that these rules provided, inter alia, that 'all disputes from time to time arising out of any such contract, including any question of law arising in the proceedings . . . shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with these rules'; that the obtaining an award . . . shall be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of any such contract'; . . . that 'documents must be taken up on presentation without prejudice to the question in dispute to be referred to the Council, failing which sellers may resell the sugar for account of whom it may concern.'

The pursuers further averred that on 18th August 1896 they forwarded an invoice of 288 bags, the price in which amounted to £337, 16s. 11d. That the defenders refused to take up the bills of lading or pay the amount in the invoice, on the ground that the bills of lading bore a marking "several bags wet, damp, and weak, several with holes." That the pursuers thereupon submitted the dispute which had arisen to the Council of the Refined Sugar Association as arbitrators, and the Council, by award dated 28th August 1896, decided that they had jurisdiction to decide the dispute within the terms of the rules of the Association, and that the buyers should retire the bills of lading. This award was at once communicated to the defenders, along with a new invoice, amounting to £337, 16s. 11d., but the defenders still refused to take up the bills of lading, whereupon the pursuers resold the 288 bags, and realised therefor £295, 15s. 7d., which being deducted from the sum of £337, 16s. 11d., left the amount sued for.

The defenders stated that they "declined to take up the bills of lading and to pay in exchange the amount of the invoice, on the ground that ex facie of said bills it appeared that the tender of sugar made was not a tender under the contract, or one which the defenders were bound to accept. Of the 288 bags tendered, no less than 98, including their contents, were soaking wet, and many others were holed. Admitted that the pursuers wrote certain letters to the Council of the Refined Sugar Association, and that said Council issued a pretended award, to which reference is made. Explained that the present action is not one for the enforcement of said award, but is an action of damages for alleged breach of contract, and that, assuming the general rules founded on by the pursuers to be applicable, they have not complied with same."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having committed a breach of the contract libelled, the pursuers are entitled to decree for the loss, damage, and expense thereby incurred to them.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The provisions as to arbitration being inept, the pursuers are not entitled to found on the pretended award.

On 4th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before further answer, allows the pursuers a proof of their averments on record, and to the defenders a conjunct probation."

The 9th June having been subsequently appointed the diet of proof, the defenders, on 11th March 1897, lodged a specification of documents, and moved for a diligence for their recovery. The Lord Ordinary struck out two articles of the specification relating to correspondence passing between the pursuers and persons other than the defenders, and granted the diligence. Among the articles in the amended specification were several which referred to writings shewing the condition and quality of the sugar at the time of shipment and discharge.

Scott, Simpson, & Wallis
v. Forrest & Turnbull.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary should have granted diligence in terms of the original specification. In any view the defenders were entitled to a diligence in terms of the amended specification. None of the grounds of defence had been repelled as irrelevant, and the interlocutor allowing proof was quoad the defenders quite general, and the Court was not entitled to limit its scope by restricting the diligence.¹ “Conjunct probation” in practice meant such a proof as would enable a defender to establish the defences stated by him, and did not merely give him an opportunity of refuting the precise statements of the pursuer. This was just an action for breach of contract, and the answer to it was that the goods tendered were not conform to contract. It was not an action to enforce the alleged award.

Argued for the pursuers;—The diligence should be refused in toto. The specification was largely concerned with writings tending to shew the condition and quality of the sugar at different dates, but that matter was not remitted to probation. The order for proof was not in general terms, but was restricted to the averments of the pursuers. These contained no reference to the condition of the sugar.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor of 4th February 1897 was not reclaimed against within six days, and is therefore final. To it, accordingly, we must look for the scope of the proof which is to be taken in this cause, and by its limits must be determined what writings are relevant to the inquiry, and may therefore be recovered by diligence.

Now, that interlocutor does not allow a proof of the whole averments on record. The well-established formula for such an allowance is to allow the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation. What has been done in this case is to allow the pursuers a proof of their averments on record, and to the defenders a conjunct probation. The reason, or at least an adequate reason, for this limitation of the order for proof is to be found in the nature of the controversy, and the state of the record. It seems to me that no relevant answer is made by the defenders to the pursuers’ averments that the Council of the Refined Sugar Association was, under the contract, the proper judge of whether the buyers were bound to retire the bills of lading, and did decide that question, and that the question whether the sugar tendered was conform to contract is not in the case. The action is one of damages; but the ground of liability is the defenders’ having failed to retire the bills of lading when ordered to do so by the Council, and the merits of the Council’s decision cannot be questioned. Accordingly, the condition of the argument is that the buyers were bound to pay for the sugar, whatever its condition may have been in point of fact.

The specification before us is manifestly framed on a totally different view of the limits of the proof to that which I have stated, and is quite inappropriate to what I hold to be its true scope as determined by the interlocutor of 4th February. Some articles of the specification are legitimate enough, and, if the defenders present a re-modelled specification, I do not doubt that they will obtain a diligence. But it is not in accordance with our practice in the Inner-House to patch up specifications which proceed on wrong principles, and in the meantime I think our proper course is to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, to refuse the motion for a diligence to recover the writings mentioned in the specification No. 42 of process, and to remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

Reparation—Relief—Relief against claim neither admitted nor established—Relevancy.—An action concluding for relief against an action for damages which had been brought against the pursuer dismissed as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer neither averred that he was liable for the damages, nor averred that he had been found liable.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

THE trustees of the deceased James Duncan were proprietors of certain premises in Miller Street, Glasgow, and Messrs Sandeman & Son, wine-merchants, were their tenants of the cellars in the sunk flat of the property.

On 18th December 1896 Duncan's trustees raised an action against A. & P. Steven, hydraulic engineers, Glasgow, concluding that the defenders should be ordained to "free and relieve the pursuers of an action raised against them in the Court of Session at the instance of David Sandeman & Son . . . the summons in which was signeted on 20th November 1896, concluding for £4000 sterling, with interest . . . and of the whole expenses and consequents of the same: And for that purpose to make payment to the pursuers of (1) the sum of £4000, with interest as aforesaid, or of such other sum, with such interest, as the pursuers herein may be decerned as defenders in said action to pay to the pursuers therein; (2) the sum of £500 sterling, or of such other sum, more or less, as the present pursuers may be found liable in to the said Messrs Sandeman & Son in said action in name of expenses; and (3) of the further sum of £500, or such other sum, more or less, as the pursuers herein may incur in connection with the defence of said action: . . . Or otherwise, the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £6000 sterling."

The pursuers averred,—In November 1895 a hoist in their premises broke down, and they entered into a contract with the defenders to put in a new one. It was the duty of the defenders in executing this operation to disconnect the pipe, which had supplied the old hoist with water, which passed under the cellar tenanted by Messrs Sandeman & Son, from the main water-pipe in the street. It was also their duty to instruct the Water Company to cut away the valve connection with the street main.

Duncan's
Trustees v.
Steven.

On 1st April 1896 the defenders intimated to the pursuers that the new hoist was in place.

"On or about 11/13th April thereafter a serious flooding occurred in the cellar let to Messrs Sandeman, whereby the same and its contents were submerged to a depth of more than 3 feet above the floor of said cellar, and much injury done to the stock of wines and spirits both in bottle and in wood stored therein. . . ." (Cond. 5) "Messrs Sandeman at once intimated to the present pursuers a claim of damages, and they have since raised in the Court of Session against the present pursuers an action of damages concluding for £4000 in respect of the loss sustained by them consequent on the flooding above referred to," being the action referred to in the conclusions of the summons before quoted.

The pursuers further averred that the flooding was due to the defenders' failure to disconnect the main pipe in the street, and to instruct the Water Company to remove the valve. "They are accordingly responsible for the flooding which occurred, and liable to relieve the pursuers of Messrs Sandeman's claim of damages. . . ." (Cond. 7) "Immediately on ascertaining the cause of the flooding, the pursuers intimated their claim to be relieved of the consequences of said flooding to the defenders. But the defenders repudiate all responsibility in the matter. The pursuers have suffered, and will suffer loss and damage, through the negligent and untradesmanlike conduct of the defenders, and by their failure to complete their contract in a careful and efficient manner, to an extent not less than £6000."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said flooding having occurred through the fault and negligence of the defenders, and through their failure to implement their contract with the pursuers in an efficient and tradesmanlike manner, the defenders are bound to relieve the pursuers of the consequences thereof. (2) The action at the instance of Messrs Sandeman having been brought against the present pursuers in consequence of the said flooding caused by the defenders' said negligence and failure as aforesaid, the pursuers are entitled to relief as concluded for. (3) Alternatively, the pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the extent sued for through the fault of the defenders, and through their failure to complete their contract with the pursuers in a careful and tradesmanlike manner, the defenders are liable in reparation therefor, and the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons.

The defenders denied liability, and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent, et separatim, premature. (2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons.*

 At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has stated what, I think, is a sufficient reason for dismissing the conclusions for relief; but, in my opinion, the action is open to a more radical objection.

The only damage alleged or suggested as having been sustained by the present pursuers arises out of the claim against them by the Messrs Sandeman. The flooding is not said to have done their cellar any harm, and it is only because it hurt the Sandemans' wine that any loss can arise to the pursuers at all. But then they can suffer through this injury to the Sandemans only if they are legally liable for it. In this action they do not say either that they are liable, or that they have been found liable for the Sandemans' loss. On the contrary, they say only that they are sued by the Sandemans in an action to which they refer, and when that action is referred to it appears that in it they deny all liability to the Sandemans. It is to be presumed that the present pursuers, if, as they say, they are not liable to the Sandemans, will be assoilzied from that action with expenses. It follows that, on the pursuers' own shewing, they have suffered, and will suffer, no loss whatever.

On this short and, as I think, conclusive ground, I consider that the con-

* "OPINION.—In this case I agree with the argument of the defenders that the action as an action of relief is irrelevant. I should for myself be prepared to accept the test of the competency of such actions expressed by Lord Neaves in the case of Colt v. Caledonian Railway Company, 21 D. 1108, 3 Macq. 833. But in any view it seems to me to be settled that the claim of relief and the claim from which relief is sought must at least be commensurate, and I think that is not the case with the claims here. They are not, in my opinion, commensurate in the sense explained in the case of Colt, and also in the more recent case of Ovington, 2 Macph. 1066.

"I apprehend, however, that this point is really of no practical importance, because the pursuers have a good conclusion for damages; and I am of opinion that they have sufficiently averred a prima facie case of breach of contract, and have also made averments of damage, which I cannot upon their statement pronounce to be necessarily irrelevant. I desire to reserve as much as possible all questions of measure of damages, which questions, in cases of this kind, are sometimes delicate, but I am not prepared to accept the defenders' argument that if damages fall to be paid under the principal action to the Messrs Sandeman, the fact of such damages being incurred may not form a relevant and material element in assessing the damages due for the defenders' alleged breach of contract.

"I shall therefore sustain the defenders' pleas so far as directed against the conclusions for relief, and dismiss those conclusions, but with respect to the conclusions for damages I shall allow the parties a proof, &c."

† The following authorities were referred to by the parties:—Colt v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 2, 1859, 21 D. 1108, 31 Scot. Jur. 621, Aug. 3, 1860, 3 Macq. 833; Ovington v. M'Vicar, May 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 1066, 36 Scot. Jur. 553; Pollock v. Wilkie, July 17, 1856, 18 D. 1311, 28 Scot. Jur. 659; Gardiner v. Main, Nov. 29, 1894, 22 R. 100.

clusion for damages ought, in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, to have shared the fate of the conclusions for relief. No. 154.

What has been said in no way prejudices any claim, whether of relief or of damages, which the present pursuers may ultimately find that they have, after the determination of Messrs Sandeman's claim. It is quite possible that, if the pursuers are found liable to the Sandemans, they may have a claim of relief against the defenders; but this must depend upon the grounds and nature of that liability. I make this remark because, while the Lord Ordinary, whose judgment is under review, had in the Sandemans' action practically decided that the present pursuers (the landlords) were liable for the flooding on a specified legal ground, this Division has recalled that interlocutor and has sent the whole case to proof. This circumstance, although it is no more, illustrates the extreme difficulty of supporting the present interlocutor, which, treating the two actions as independent, sends the present action to proof, irrespective altogether of the result, or the dependence, of the other.

June 1, 1897.
Duncan's
Trustees v.
Steven.

I shall only add one observation of a practical kind. I am well aware that in practice it is sometimes an anxious question what a man should do who being sued for damages—and of course my remarks apply to questions of damages—does not think that he is liable (but is not sure), but at all events feels confident that if he is legally liable the ultimate liability rests with another. My judgment to-day does not in the least suggest that, in such cases, notice should not be given of the claim or such further invitation as is not unusual for concerted opposition to the claim. But in order to save such a right of recourse, it is not necessary to come into Court with a claim of relief or damages until liability is either admitted or established, and if anyone comes into Court with a premature action, his having an intelligible motive for doing so cannot exempt his action from the fate which attends irrelevancy.

I am for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and dismissing the action.

west or north-west. According to the experience of the port there was a probability that under the existing conditions of the weather the wind would veer to the west. During the night it did so veer and blew a gale of extraordinary severity, which resulted in damage to the steamship, and to most of the other vessels in the harbour.

In an action of damages by the owner of the steamship against the Harbour Trustees, on the ground that the harbour-master had wrongfully directed the removal of the vessel to a berth which was known to be unsafe, held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the damage was due to the extraordinary violence of the storm, and not to any fault on the part of the harbour-master in fixing the berth, and that the defenders were not liable.

2D DIVISION.
Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

THE STEAMSHIP "DENIA," of Troon, an iron screw-steamer of 248 tons gross and 97 tons net register, while in berth in Ayr Harbour, sustained injuries during a storm which occurred on the night of the 21st and the morning of the 22d December 1894, and her owner, Walter Bain Niven, Glasgow, raised this action of damages for £1100 against the Trustees of Ayr Harbour. The pursuer averred that the "Denia" completed her loading about 9.20 P.M. on 21st December. That the hatches were then secured and made ready for sea, but that as the wind was blowing strong from the south, and was gradually increasing in strength, the master decided to remain in harbour. (Cond. 4) "By eleven o'clock on the same night the wind had increased to a gale with heavy squalls, but notwithstanding the severity of the weather and the obvious danger of shifting the steamer from what was a safe berth to one very much exposed, the assistant deputy-harbour-master, John Sloan, for whom the defenders are responsible, wrongfully ordered the master of the 'Denia' to remove his vessel to the dock basin, Ayr, to make room for another steamer which was expected to arrive during the night. The dock basin is a notoriously unsafe place for vessels to berth in, being exposed to north-westerly and west-north-westerly winds. It is specially dangerous when a gale is blowing from the south, as the wind almost invariably veers to the west and north-westward, and the dock basin is then exposed to the full reach of the sea without protection from the breakwater. This was well known to the defenders."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having sustained loss and damage to the amount sued for, through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, as above set forth, decree ought to be granted as craved.

The defenders averred that the "Denia" was ordered to remove from the crane berth to make room for another vessel; that the berth in the dock basin was safe when it was assigned to her; that at this time the storm, which ultimately proved to be of extreme violence, was unforeseen, and that the "Denia's" moorings were inadequate.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The damage sustained by the pursuer having been caused, or at all events materially contributed to, by the master or other persons in charge of the "Denia," the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (3) The damage sustained by the "Denia" not having been caused by any fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, the defenders ought to be assoilzied. (4) Separatim, the accident condended on being the result of a damnum fatale, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed a proof, which established the following facts :—The “Denia” loaded her cargo at a crane berth in Ayr Harbour, and by 10 P.M. the hatches were secured, and she was made ready for sea. The wind was blowing strong from the south-east, with rain, and the barometer was falling rapidly, and Captain Watters, the master, decided to remain in harbour all night. The assistant deputy-harbour-master, Sloan, who was a man of experience, and sixty-eight years of age, ordered the master to remove the “Denia” from the loading berth, as it was required for another vessel which was to arrive that night. The master deposed that Sloan ordered him to a berth in the dock basin. Sloan, who was corroborated by a pilot, Houston, stated that he gave the master the choice of two berths, either in the dock basin or in the slip dock, and that the master chose the former. About 11 P.M. the “Denia” was moored to a berth in the dock basin. In the course of the night the wind veered to west and north-west, and increased to a strong gale. Between 2 and 3 A.M. on the following day the vessel was being dashed by the waves against the quay wall, and at 3 A.M. the crew left the vessel from fear that she might sink. Between 5 and 6 o’clock, a hurricane was blowing, and the vessel broke from her moorings, and was seriously damaged.

No. 155.

Niven v. Ayr
Harbour
Trustees.

William Watters, the master of the “Denia,” deposed that when the vessel had finished loading, the wind was about south-west, and that “it was gradually going round. I fully expected it would go round. When a gale begins in the south or south-west I find as a rule that it goes round to west or north-west in these latitudes. . . . I did not have in view that I would need to lie there at that berth in a gale of wind. My intention was to go into the dock. I said I would go to the basin on condition that they should allow me into the dock when the gate was open, but when the gate was open it was impossible to shift anywhere. . . . Cross.— . . . I objected to shift [from the loading berth]. I said the weather was not fit for shifting anywhere. It was safe enough then, if the wind had remained in the quarter where it was. It was south-south-east about that time. There was no danger in shifting, and the berth I went to at the basin was quite a safe berth so long as the wind remained as it was when I went to it. . . . When the wind is south-south-east it does not always go to the north-west. It sometimes backs towards the east, and sometimes remains in the south. At the time when we shifted I could not tell which way it would go. . . . (Q.) Was there any reason why you should not have tried to take a hawser across and make it fast to a pawl on the west side? (A.) It was not necessary so long as the wind was in the south’ard. . . . When the wind began to veer, and got somewhat into the west, there was no possibility of getting a rope across. The wind shifted suddenly. When it came round to the west there was no pilot in Ayr that would have taken a rope out.”

Captain Peter Barr deposed that he was harbour-master at Ayr from 1883 to 1887, that as a shipowner he had had experience of Ayr Harbour for seven years prior to 1883, and that the berth on the east side of the dock basin was the berth assigned to his firm by the Harbour Trustees, and that it was used all the time he was managing partner of the Ayr Steamship Company. That they had in winter time extreme difficulty in saving vessels from taking damage, but their vessels were prepared with very heavy elm beltings faced with iron. It was not uncommon for them to have ropes run across to the north-west side of the basin to lift the weight off the quay wall. That he would not have shifted the “Denia” to lie at this berth in the face of a rising gale. With the wind north-north-west, it was an unsafe berth. With the wind south or south-west, and a falling barometer, his experience was that it invariably blows up to north-north-west to blow out especially with rain. Cross.—This berth was the regular and only berthing place of the Ayr Shipping Company for ten or twelve years.

Walter Bain, a partner of the Ayr Steam Shipping Company and a Harbour Trustee, deponed that the company frequently allowed their vessels to be in this berth in a north-west gale with a rope across the basin; that when it was impossible to send a rope across by a boat, it could be sent by using a heaving line from the opposite side. "My view is, that when she was moored there two things should have been done—a cable should have been procured and stretched across the harbour, and steam should have been kept up. Vessels are not in the habit of lying at this basin berth. It is not a regular berth, but is only used for putting a vessel into before or after loading."

Captain John Mackie deponed that in January and February 1889 he was master of the ship "Margaret," then chartered to the Ayr Shipping Company; that he found their berth in the basin very unsafe when the wind was in the west or north-west. "If it was blowing a gale we generally put a rope across to the other side of the dock to hold her as tight as we could, but I found in all cases that the vessel broke the rope"; that in February 1889 the "Margaret" was damaged severely, the repairs costing £870.

John Sloan, the assistant harbour-master, deponed that the berth was an equipped part of the harbour and very much used. That he offered a berth either at the slip or the basin, but did not recommend one more than the other. It depended on which way the wind was. When the wind is west to north-west the slip is the worst place in Ayr Harbour. He further deponed that he never saw as much damage to shipping in Ayr as was done that night—nearly every vessel was damaged.

Captain John Mathison, who had been for twelve years in command of boats belonging to the Ayr Steam Shipping Company, deponed that he was in Ayr Harbour in command of the "Mona" on 21st December 1894, and sailed about 11 P.M. on that day. The wind was then "a moderate S.W. gale. It got worse as we proceeded. The worst of it was between five and seven in the morning, it was then blowing with hurricane force. When I left Ayr I had not anticipated any such change of weather. I watched the barometer and the signs of the times, but with all my experience I did not expect such a sudden change." He had often occupied the berth in question in all weathers, and had never sustained serious damage. In westerly winds he used a rope across the basin to steady the vessel. He would have had no objection to go to the berth if he had been ordered on the 21st.

Dr Alexander Buchan, secretary of the Scottish Meteorological Society, deponed,—“The question is, what proportion of storms beginning from S.S.E. round to S.S.W. veered round during their continuance to N.W. The following is a summary of the cases examined during twenty Decembers ending 1894. The two lighthouses examined were the two nearest to Ayr, Turnberry and Pladda. In all, 96 storms were reported on by the lighthouse keepers. Of these 41 began from S.S.E., S., or S.S.W. Grouping these 41 cases, the following are the results: (1) storms not attended with any change of direction of wind at all, 6. I am not speaking of the veering of the wind generally, but strong winds rising to storms. (2) Storms which did not veer but backed to east, 4. (3) Storms which veered from the southward only to the south-west, and did not go further to the north, 9. No. 155.

(4) Storms which veered from the southward only to west, 11; that is to say, 30 did not get beyond west. (5) Storms which veered from southward to N.W., 10; and 1 got to north. Cross.—I have also looked into the question of the storms which commenced in the S.W. Of these five veered to west; two veered to N.W.; and three veered to north—in all ten beginning at S.W. All the storms that began in the S.W. veered to W. and N. (Q.) Is it a matter of familiar experience that storms that begin in the S. or S.W. veer westward and blow themselves out in the N.W.? (A.) Some do and some do not. I have stated the proportion as nearly as I can. From the facts which I have collated I would say that by far the most of the storms that begin in the S.W. finish off in the W. or N.W. I cannot at the present moment point to one contrary instance. Re-examined.—Of the four storms which began at S.S.E., S., or S.S.W., and backed to E., two began from S. to S.E. The great majority of those that moved westward did not get beyond west. In fact there is a common proverb in the west of Scotland that 'the west wind is a gentleman and goes to bed.' It is familiar to us that when the wind goes to the west it tends to fall."

Niven v. Ayr
Harbour
Trustees.

On 5th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £750 sterling, with interest thereon as concluded for." *

* "OPINION.—There can be no doubt about the proposition in law on which this claim of damages rests. It is that managers of a harbour, who provide accommodation for shipping, and invite vessels to use it, are bound to use reasonable diligence to prevent the occurrence of injury to the vessels. They do not insure against accident, but if they fail in using reasonable diligence to prevent it, they are liable in damages.

"This claim, accordingly, is laid on culpa, and the culpa alleged is that, on a stormy night in December 1894, the assistant deputy-harbour-master, an old man named Sloan, ordered the pursuer's steamer the 'Denia' (248 tons gross register) out of a safe berth into an unsafe one, where she was exposed to the full force of wind and sea, and thereby sustained very serious damage. The defenders say that there is no case in the books in which managers of a harbour have been made liable for injuries arising from stress of weather. That may be; the cases under this head are not very numerous altogether. But I see no difference in principle between liability for a careless order which (for example) sends a vessel aground, and liability for a careless order which deprives her of the very protection against the elements which harbours profess to afford.

"Of course it must be shewn that the order was careless; and one element of the carelessness must necessarily be that the harbour-master could have done better for the ship. In this case it is certain that he could not have done worse; for the proof establishes beyond all doubt that the dock basin berth is the most dangerous berth in the harbour when the wind blows strongly from the west or north-west. It was abandoned principally for that reason by the Ayr Shipping Company in 1892; and Mr Bain, one of the partners of that company (as well as one of the harbour trustees), admits that 'it is not a regular berth, but is only used for putting a vessel into before or after loading.'

"Now, the 'Denia' had just completed her loading, and if she had been waiting in the harbour for any other reason than stress of weather, it might have been quite safe to put her there. But her skipper told Sloan that he was not going to sea because of the gale, and nobody says that he was

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was no evidence of direct fault on Sloan's part. His order was given in the regular course of harbour control. The "Denia" had a choice of berths, and the dock basin was accepted. But whether this were so or not, her berth was one regularly used, and at least safe at the time she was sent to it. That was sufficient to exculpate the defenders. No doubt it was unsafe in a gale from the north-west, and the Lord Ordinary found that Sloan should have been guided by the probability that the gale would wester. But this was pure speculation, and only a certainty of eventual danger would make the defenders liable for the damage ultimately sustained. The rule for guidance was laid down in the "Excelsior."¹ The defenders were not bound to guarantee the safest berth in all weathers. Their duty was to provide reasonably safe accommodation in ordinary circumstances, and to put the control of the harbour in the hands of experienced officials. They had performed their duty, and no fault was proved for which they were liable.²

wrong in that decision. There were all the indications of a dirty night—a rapidly falling barometer, and an increasing gale from the south. Moreover, the scientific and seafaring witnesses are agreed in saying that, when these conditions exist, there is a strong probability of the wind getting more and more westerly, until it dies away in the north-west.

"There is evidence to the effect that, about 11 P.M., when the change of berth took place, the dock basin was safe enough, for the wind was then from the south. But probability must be the guide of harbour-masters as of other people, and it seems to me that Sloan ought to have anticipated that the probable course of the storm would make that berth the worst in the harbour.

"What then ought Sloan to have done? The pursuer's case on record is, that he ought not to have moved the 'Denia' from the berth where she loaded. If he had left her there, she would probably have fared just as the 'Kathleen,' did, which took her place, and that would have meant receiving very little injury. But I do not think it can be said that there was negligence in the mere act of moving her, so long as she was given an equally safe berth elsewhere. Sloan acted as he did from pure routine, without, I believe, bestowing a thought on the prospects of the night; and it was according to strict routine that a vessel having completed her loading should give place at a crane berth to another vessel which was expected to arrive for the purpose of unloading.

"But in my view of the evidence it is vain to say that Sloan might not have found a much safer berth for the 'Denia.' Indeed, his own evidence is conclusive on that point. He says that he offered the master of the 'Denia' a berth in the slip basin on the south side of the harbour, and that the master preferred the other. I have great doubts whether any such choice was distinctly offered. If it had been, I think it would have been averred on record, and it is not. That the slip basin was mentioned as a possible berth either by Sloan or by one of the pilots, I do not doubt, but Sloan himself does not profess that he either thought or said that the slip berth would be the safer of the two, and I have no idea that a harbour-master can evade responsibility for his berthing orders by throwing alternatives at the head of a shipmaster without explanation, and letting him please himself. If he tenders two berths, and does not indicate a preference for either, he must be taken as representing that both are suitable and safe. While, therefore, the rather unsatisfactory evidence as to the offer of

Argued for the pursuer;—The berth to which the “Denia” was ordered was dangerous. If so, the defenders were liable. The pursuer did not maintain that they were bound to give an absolutely safe berth to every vessel in harbour, but if the berth was dangerous the onus was on them to shew a necessity for assigning it. They had not discharged this. The “Denia” had no choice of berths. Had this been given it would have appeared on record. The danger was clear. It was virtually a certainty that the wind would wester. Dock rates were paid for safe accommodation, and an owner was entitled to claim that his ship should not be exposed to danger in the berth for which he paid.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary in this case has decided that the slip berth does not avail to relieve the defenders of responsibility, it helps the pursuer by shewing that there was at all events one vacant berth where the ‘Denia’ would have been in comparative safety. I think there was at least one other, because the evidence shews that there were six berths on the north side of the river, and only four of these were occupied on the night in question. A fifth was retained for the ‘Carrick,’ which did not come in that night, but room might quite well have been found for the ‘Denia’ in the sixth if Sloan had wished to do so. The truth is, that he never applied his mind to the subject, because he did not expect the night to turn out so bad as it did. I confess to learning with some surprise that the management of Ayr Harbour admits of an old man like Sloan being left in sole charge during what the defenders themselves describe as ‘one of the most violent storms which have been experienced in Scotland for many years,’ and that no provision is made for summoning the harbour-master, or even the deputy-harbour-master, in such an emergency.

“This leads me to notice in a word the defence of damnum fatale. That defence is never effectual in questions of negligence, unless the act of God is such that no human prudence could have foreseen it, or have averted the consequences. In this case the storm was violent, but it was not unprecedented. The statistics kept at Glasgow Observatory shew that during the last twelve years there have been eight gales of greater velocity.

“Another point strongly insisted on by the defenders was that the damage to the ‘Denia’ might have been prevented if, in addition to her being moored fore and aft in the ordinary way to the south side of the basin, a hawser had been passed across and secured to the north side.

“The experience of the witness Mackie, who was captain of the ‘Margaret’ in 1889, goes to shew that even this precaution would not have been effectual, for it did not prevent that vessel receiving injuries which cost £870 to repair. But I am clearly of opinion that, if an extraordinary precaution of this kind was necessary, it was the duty of the harbour-master to order it. By the Harbours Clauses Act of 1847, sec. 52, he is empowered to give directions, inter alia, for regulating the manner in which a vessel is to lie in harbour, ‘and its position, mooring or unmooring, placing or removing whilst therein.’ In this case it would have been quite illegal for the ship-master to have drawn a rope across the entrance to a dock without the harbour-master’s express permission. The ropes for mooring are supplied by the ship, but it is for the harbour-master to direct how these are to be used.

“I am therefore of opinion that the defenders’ representative was in fault in ordering the ‘Denia’ to a berth which was likely to become, as it did become, dangerous in the course of a few hours. . . .”

the vessel belonging to the pursuer was damaged through the fault of the defenders. Although he did not hold them liable for the whole damage, he held that a very large proportion was due to the pursuer—as his Lordship says, sitting as a jury he assessed a certain amount of the total damage. I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor cannot be sustained. The pursuer's vessel was loaded at an ordinary berth and was ready for sea, and according to the usual practice in that harbour, and indeed in harbours generally, she being ready for sea and wishing to remain in the harbour, it was quite appropriate that she should be removed from the loading-berth and placed in another berth. In ordinary course she would have gone to sea, and we have evidence that one of the vessels in the harbour did go to sea that night. This vessel had the choice of two berths—one at the slip dock, and the other that which she did get. I find from the evidence that the master said that he took that berth in the dock basin provided that when the dock gates were opened he would be allowed to go into the dock and rest there. After he was placed in the dock basin and moored, the wind veered round a considerable number of points from the direction it had at the time he was placed there, and a violent storm arose. The storm was so violent that, as we are informed, every vessel within the harbour that night suffered more or less injury, and of course however safe any berth might be in ordinary circumstances it might be a berth in which a vessel would suffer more damage than a vessel in some other berth. The fault alleged against the Ayr Harbour Trustees is based upon the fact that John Sloan, who is what is called berthing-master, and who had charge of the department for berthing vessels, was an old man, the suggestion being that he was no longer fit for his duty. There is no evidence of that kind. At the time he was doing this work he was sixty-eight years of age. One would have thought that was a very suitable duty for a man who was well accustomed to the sea, had long years of training on the sea, but who was no longer fit for the rough severe work of managing a vessel at sea. As experience leads one to know, there are men of that age fulfilling such duties—not requiring great bodily strength, but only requiring that a man shall still have possession of his faculties and judgment. There are many men of such age in similar situations. Nothing is said by any of the witnesses against Sloan's capacity for work or experience. Therefore I take it that nothing can be said as regards the defenders having a man in their service unfit to do the work. Now, he selected that berth, and I shall assume for a moment there was no choice given to the master of the vessel—that Sloan said that was the berth he was to go to. What do we find as regards the master himself, who was a man of experience? The fault attributed to Sloan was that he ought to have formed a judgment that a storm was coming from a direction that would be dangerous to a vessel lying at that berth. The master himself entertained no such idea. The berth was one which was used regularly for loading purposes, although not for loading such a cargo as he had, and it was used in all ordinary weathers. Now, the master was put there, and he says distinctly in his evidence when he is asked why he did not pass a five-inch warp across to the other side of the dock basin,—“We did not require it when we went into that berth; the berth was quite safe, and therefore we did not require it till the wind shifted. When the wind began to veer and got somewhat into the west, there was no possibility of getting a rope across. The wind shifted suddenly,"—and then he says that at the time he went to the berth he did not consider he was in any danger. Now, that being so, I do not understand how it can be held that this deputy-assistant, whose duty it was to berth vessels, was in fault because he placed this vessel at a berth which no seaman at the time thought was an unsafe berth. The master did not foresee that any such thing would happen, otherwise he would have taken steps to prevent it. The storm seems to have been of an exceptional character, because we have evidence from the most experienced man probably in Scotland that such a wind as they had here was in ordinary circumstances likely to die down. In the words of this witness "the west wind is a gentleman and goes to bed." Therefore, upon the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that the injury to this vessel, as to other vessels in the harbour, was caused by the exceptional circumstances of that night, which there was no reason to anticipate, and which indeed appear not to have been anticipated by anybody at the time. Upon the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that the judgment cannot be sustained, and that we ought to assoilzie the defenders.

LORD YOUNG.—The issue upon which this case was tried, and without any miscarriage whatever, before the Lord Ordinary, as appears from the plea in law for the pursuer, is whether the pursuer sustained loss and damage from the fault of the defenders or of those for whom they are responsible. Upon that issue the Lord Ordinary found for the pursuer and assessed the damages at the sum which he states. Upon a re-trial of the case before us on the same evidence, I am of opinion that the verdict ought to be for the defenders. I think there is no evidence before us in the proof that the pursuer sustained damage through any action or fault on the part of the defenders or of any of their servants for whom they are responsible. I only hesitate arriving at that conclusion because it differs from the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary before whom the evidence was taken. I am always disposed to give great weight to the consideration of the case by the Lord Ordinary. I recognise the inexpediency upon many views, which I need not express, of interfering with a verdict or conclusion in point of fact of the Lord Ordinary before whom the witnesses were examined, if there is reasonable evidence to support it. I have often expressed the opinion, as many other Judges have done, that it is not enough, or even generally sufficient, that you would probably have arrived at another conclusion yourself. I think the case against the Lord Ordinary's verdict must be stronger than that. Having that quite in view, I am of opinion that the verdict of the Lord Ordinary cannot be sustained, and with your Lordship I am of opinion that the judgment should be recalled.

LORD TRAYNER.—The evidence in this case is, on some points, conflicting, but the facts material to the issue seem to me to be well established.

I have no doubt that Sloan, in ordering the master of the "Denia" to change his berth, was acting within his right, and, indeed, in the proper discharge of his duty. The berth in which the "Denia" lay was a loading berth; she had finished loading and was ready for sea; and that berth was wanted for another vessel which was known to be coming in (and in point of fact came in) that night to load. In these circumstances it was quite right in Sloan to order the "Denia" out to make way for the coming vessel, and his doing so was in accordance with the general practice which prevails at Ayr Harbour as elsewhere. The master of the "Denia" was well aware of this practice, and he says nothing against it. Having determined not to put to sea that night, the master of the "Denia" was supplied with another berth. The pursuer says it was a dangerous one, and therefore one into which the "Denia" should not have been put. But there was nothing dangerous in the berth itself. It became dangerous only if a storm came on from the west or north-west. Now, on the night of the 2d December there was a storm threatening. The wind began to blow from the south-south-east, accompanied with rain, and there is evidence to shew that in such circumstances there is a great probability that the wind will go round to the west and north-west. Certainty of that there could not be, but according to experience, a great probability. And it so happened upon this occasion. The result was that through the violence of the storm the "Denia" was bumped up against the quay wall where she was lying and received the damage, or part of the damage, for which compensation is here demanded. For that damage, in my opinion, the defenders are not responsible. As I have said, the berth itself was in no way objectionable. It was a perfectly safe berth in an ordinary state of the weather. More than that, according to the evidence of the master of the "Denia" himself, it was a perfectly safe berth at the time he went into it, about 11 P.M. of the 21st, and but for the subsequent violence of the storm, was a berth in which the "Denia" could have remained safely until she went to sea. It was only about 2 or 3 o'clock A.M. of the 22d that the master of the "Denia" found any inconvenience from the "wind going round," and it was between that time and 5 or 6 o'clock of the same morning that the storm attained such violence as to cause the damage complained of. It was the storm, and not the berth, which was the proximate cause of the damage, and for that the defenders are not responsible. That the wind would go round to the north or north-west was perhaps likely, but there was no certainty that it would increase to such a force as it did. On this matter of the probable change of wind, it is worth noticing that the master of the "Denia" says,—“At the time when we shifted I could not tell which way it would go.” Could Sloan be expected to be better informed than the master of the "Denia"?

I think it proved that Sloan gave the "Denia" the best berth at his disposal, and that there was no berth on the north side of the river available. If necessary, I should also be prepared to hold it proved that the "Denia" had the choice of two berths, and that the master chose the one in which his ship was damaged. But my opinion, in giving judgment for the defenders, is chiefly based on this, that the storm, and not the berth, caused the damage; that the berth was safe in the opinion of all concerned at the time it was assigned to and taken by the "Denia"; and that subsequent events imposed no liability on the defenders. It is not immaterial to remember that on the occasion in question scarcely a vessel in harbour on the Ayrshire coast escaped damage that night, irrespective of the kind of berth she occupied.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with all your Lordships that the proof does No. 155.

Ship "Blair-

Limited, v.
Macredie.

Insurance—Marine Insurance—Valued Policy—Total Constructive Loss.

The question whether a ship, insured under a valued policy, is a total constructive loss or only a partial loss, is to be determined by the state of matters existing at the date when action on the policy is raised, and not by the state of matters at the date of notice of abandonment, and that whether the state of matters at the date of the action is due to accident, or the intervention of third parties, or to the exertions of the insurers themselves.

A ship, insured under a valued policy, was sunk in deep water. On 15th April the insured gave notice of abandonment, which the insurers declined to accept. In July the insurers at considerable cost raised the ship and brought her into harbour. The insured then, on 1st December, raised an action against the insurers concluding as for a total constructive loss. The insurers pleaded that the loss was a partial loss only. It was admitted that the ship could not have been raised, brought into harbour, and refitted for a sum within her value when ready for sea, but it was further admitted that at the date of the action the expenditure necessary to right her for sea would be less than her value when ready for sea.

Held that the question whether the ship was a total constructive loss or a partial loss only was to be determined by her condition as at the raising of the action, and consequently that the loss was a partial loss only.

The rule of the English Admiralty Court followed; the decision of the Court of Session in Robertson, Forsyth, & Co. v. Stewart, Smith, & Co. Feb 10, 1809, F. C. overruled.

By five policies of insurance, for a total sum of £15,000 the "Blairmore," belonging to the Sailing Ship "Blairmore" Company, Limited, was insured for two calendar months in port at San Francisco, and/or San Francisco Bay, and/or its tributaries, commencing on 3d April 1896 and ending on 3d June 1896. Each of the policies contained a clause providing that "the acts of insurer or insured, in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured, shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment."

On 9th April 1896 the "Blairmore" was struck by a sudden squall when lying in San Francisco Bay, and sank.

On 15th April 1896 the owners of the "Blairmore" gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters, which the underwriters declined to accept.

In July 1896 the vessel was raised by the underwriters and docked in San Francisco Harbour.

On 1st December 1896 the Sailing Ship "Blairmore" Company, Limited, and Thomson, Dickie, & Company, shipowners, and marine insurance brokers, Glasgow, the managing owners of the "Blairmore," raised an action against John Macredie, merchant, Glasgow, concluding for payment of £100, being the sum for which the defender had underwritten one of the policies on the "Blairmore." The action was

June 4, 1897.
Ship "Blair-
more" Co.,
Limited, v.
Macredie.

The pursuers maintained that the "Blairmore" was to be treated as a total constructive loss, in respect that looking to her condition as at the date when notice of abandonment was given (when she was still at the bottom of San Francisco Bay), the cost of restoring her to the condition in which she was before she sank would be greater than her value when restored, the pursuers' averment being;—(Cond. 4.) "The cost of raising and repairing said ship would be about £15,000, and her value after being raised and repaired would be about £9600. The pursuers believe and aver that the underwriters actually expended a sum of £8000 or thereby in raising the vessel, and bringing her into a place of safety."

The defender maintained that the question as to whether a vessel was a total constructive loss was to be determined by her condition as at the date of raising an action on the policy; and he averred that the whole expenditure (stated by him at £7600) necessary to raise the "Blairmore" and bring her into safety in San Francisco Harbour, had been incurred by the underwriters prior to the bringing of the action; and he therefore pleaded (1) the pursuers' averments are irrelevant,—the ground of irrelevancy maintained by the defender being that the pursuers did not aver that the cost of repairing and refitting the "Blairmore," in so far as incurred after she had been brought into San Francisco Harbour (and consequently after the raising of the action), would exceed her value when repaired and refitted.

On 18th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers' statements are irrelevant as founding a claim under the policy in question for a total loss; therefore sustains the first plea in law for the defender, and dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers' company are owners of the ship "Blairmore" of Glasgow, which, in April 1896, stood insured on a time policy for the sum of £15,000; and the present action is brought against the underwriters (or rather against one of their number, who has been selected to try the question), concluding as for a constructive total loss of the ship. There are several defences, but in the first place the defender pleads that the action is irrelevant, in respect that it is not alleged by the pursuers that, as matters stand, and as they stood at the date of the action, the ship is incapable of repair at a cost within her actual value.

"The record is not, perhaps, in the best shape for a judgment upon relevancy—which apparently both parties desire; but I think it may be taken that the following is the state of the facts, as alleged or admitted by the pursuers.

"The 'Blairmore' was, it appears, lying in San Francisco Bay on the 9th April last. On that day she was struck by a squall and sank. She thereby became, at least for the time, a constructive total loss. This, I think, is hardly disputed. At all events, notice of abandonment was duly given to the underwriters; and although that notice was not accepted, but declined, it must, I think, for present purposes, be assumed that, at the date of the notice, the vessel was so placed that, if an action had been at once brought, the owners must have recovered as for a total loss.

"But what happened in point of fact was this: The owners did not at once bring their action; and the underwriters, declining to accept the notice of abandonment, proceeded to raise the ship; and before the action was brought they had succeeded in doing so, and in placing her in safety in San Francisco Harbour. The cost was considerable, amounting, it is said, to

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The question whether there was a constructive total loss was to be determined by the state of matters at the date when notice of abandonment was given, and not by the state of matters at the date when the claim on the policy was judicially made. According to that rule the pursuers prevailed. In England another rule had been accepted, the precise meaning and effect of which would be afterwards considered, but that the date of giving notice of abandonment was the punctum temporis was settled to be the rule of the law of Scotland in 1809 by the decision of the whole Court in Robertson, Forsyth, & Company v. Stewart, Smith, & Company.¹ It was true that that case was appealed, and that the judgment was affirmed on the ground that the underwriters had accepted abandonment as for a total loss; but nothing was said on appeal in disapproval of the ground of judgment of the Court of Session; on the contrary, Lord Eldon, who with Lord Redesdale heard the appeal, expressly avoided saying anything in approval of the rule laid down in England in Bainbridge v. Neilson,² and Falkner v. Ritchie;³ and in Shepherd v. Henderson,⁴ the only subsequent Scots case in which the question was mooted, opinions were expressed—

Limited, v.
Maeredie.

£7600, a cost considerably exceeding what, having regard to the value of the vessel, a prudent owner would have expended for the purpose. Such at least is the pursuers' statement; and, accordingly, it must at this stage be taken as true that but for the high valuation expressed in the policy (a valuation which, in the event of total loss (actual or constructive), fixes the payment to the insured), the underwriters would not have thought of raising the vessel at so great a cost. They did, however, raise her, and she now lies in San Francisco Harbour, not indeed ready for sea, but capable of repair; and that at a cost which, as I have said, the pursuers do not allege would equal her actual value.

"These being the facts, the first question which arises is this: Is it necessary for the pursuers to aver and prove not only that there was a total loss, actual or constructive, at the date of abandonment, but also that that state of matters continued down to the raising of the action?"

"On this head, the controversy between the parties comes, I think, to a very narrow point.

"It was conceded on both sides that the question is one of a kind on which the Scotch Courts, having no established rule of their own, are rightly accustomed to follow the rules established in England. It was also conceded that in the law of England (differing from the law of most maritime states, including France and America) it has long been a settled rule that, in deciding as between total and partial loss, the date to be looked to is not the date of abandonment, but the date of action. All this the pursuers concede. But, according to them, the rule or principle thus expressed means, when examined, only this—that the insurers, equally with the insured, are entitled to the benefit, by way of evidence, of all light which may be derived from anything which may have occurred prior to the date of the raising of the action.

"Now, as to this, I have only to say that I am unable so to limit the English rule. So limited, it would not, as it seems to me, really differ from

The question upon the authorities, therefore, stood thus,—on the one hand there was the unanimous and express decision of the whole Court in Robertson, Forsyth, & Company,¹ which had never been overruled, and which adopted the rule accepted in France, the United States, and probably every maritime country except England;² on the other hand there was the rule adopted in England. In such a state of matters the question must be regarded as concluded so far as Scotland was concerned by Robertson, Forsyth, & Company.¹ In the recent case of *Currie v. M'Knight*³ in the House of Lords, opinions were expressed to the effect that in questions of maritime law the rules laid down in the English Admiralty Court must prevail in Scotland. Where there was neither authority nor principle in the Scots books on any question of maritime law—and that was the case with reference to the question in *Currie v. M'Knight*³—such a doctrine might be reasonable; but it could not be understood to mean that henceforward the English Admiralty rules were to prevail in Scotland, no matter what had been decided in Scotland previously, and even if the English rules the French and American rules, which yet it notoriously does. Moreover, on the construction suggested, it would not really be the date of the action, but the date of trial, which would have to be looked to. It is not, therefore, surprising that the pursuers could cite no authority for their proposition. I have looked into the English authorities, and rightly or wrongly, they seem to me to establish quite clearly that, however well justified the notice of abandonment was when given, yet, if before action is brought, the situation has changed, the insurers have the benefit of the change. This is, perhaps, sufficiently apparent from the opinion of Lord Blackburn in the case of Shepherd v. Henderson, L. R., 7 App. Cases, 71.

"There is, however, a second point raised by the pursuers, which is perhaps more arguable. Be it, they say, that the insurers may take advantage of any accident or any act of third parties bettering the situation of the vessel at the date of action, this does not imply that the insurers can themselves intervene, and by operations of their own—conducted it may be at exorbitant cost—convert a total into a partial loss, and so, it may be, escape from their just obligations under a valued policy.

"I confess I was at first rather impressed by this argument. But on consideration, I have not been able to find any sufficient ground for it. If the rule be that the question between partial and total loss is in suspense until the date of the action, I have failed to discover any term in the contract of insurance, or any rule of general law, which should disable the insurers from doing their best in the interval between notice and action to improve the situation to their advantage. The vessel is, we shall say, abandoned and derelict. The underwriters send in search of her and tow her into port. Or she is, as here, submerged. They raise her and place her in a graving dock. I do not, I confess, see why, having done so lawfully, they should be bound to discuss with the insured the propriety or cost of their operations; or why, not choosing to do so, they should be bound to charge as for salvage; and to have such charge treated as a charge affecting the vessel. The true position is rather, I take it, this, that the shipowner in the cases figured has had the benefit of a gratuitous, just as he might conflicted with well-settled principles of the Scots common law. No. 156. Moreover, it was explained in *Currie v. M'Knight*¹ that the English Admiralty rules were of force in Scotland, not because they were English, but because they were part of the general law maritime. It was a curious commentary on this suggested foundation of the doctrine that it was now proposed to use the doctrine as the means of forcing into Scots law a rule which had been solemnly repudiated by the Scots Court, and which had been adopted by England alone among maritime nations.

(2) But assuming that the English rule was to be adopted in Scotland, that rule—at least as generally and beyond question accepted—went no farther than this—that there were to be taken into account, not merely the facts existing at the date of notice of abandonment so far as known to the insured, but also all facts which the insured came to know after that date, and before the date of the action, provided that they existed at the date of the notice; as where the ship was supposed at the date of the notice to be in possession of the enemy, or to be derelict, but had in fact at that date been recaptured, or brought into port.²

Further, the English rule applied only to cases of capture, and not to cases of loss by the perils of the sea. Here when the notice of abandonment was given, the ship was at the bottom of the sea—unquestionably a total loss. She had ceased in fact to be a vessel. Even the case of stranding or abandoning a vessel at sea might be different. Besides, the test was whether a prudent owner uninsured would have thought it worth while to save,³ and no prudent owner have had the benefit of an accidental salvage; and that his claim under his policy, which is a claim for indemnity, must be considered in view of that fact.

"It would, of course, be a different matter if the defender's interference with the vessel could be construed as an acceptance of the abandonment; or, what comes to the same thing, could be held as implying an assumption of ownership. But there are two difficulties in the way of that conclusion. In the first place, as has more than once been decided, salvage operations by the insurers do not per se imply acceptance of abandonment. They only do so when the whole circumstances justify the insured in so inferring. In the second place, there is in the present policy an express clause providing that 'the acts of the insurer or insured, in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured, shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment.'

"I cannot, therefore, hold that the underwriters were not at liberty, after notice of abandonment, to raise the ship with a view of converting her from a total into a partial loss; or that the cost which they incurred in doing so falls to be treated as if it were a charge by outside salvors affecting the vessel. I should perhaps add that although I have not been able to find any express decision upon this point, it is a point noticed in 'Arnould on Marine Insurance,' 2, 972, 6th edn., and the author's opinion seems to be that the English rule (being what it is) involves as a corollary the right of the insurers to repair as far as they please, after notice of abandonment and before action.

"The result on the whole is that as the ship is now raised and in safety, and as the pursuers do not aver that she cannot be repaired within her actual value, I must hold this action to be irrelevant, and dismiss the same. This, of course, will not prevent the pursuers from bringing, if necessary, another action claiming as for a partial loss."

(3) Assuming that the rule of the law of England was to be followed, and that it was to be understood in the more extended sense for which the defender contended,—i.e., as entitling the insurers to take into consideration changes of circumstances occurring before the raising of the action on the policy, the only changes which it was legitimate to take into consideration were changes due to accident or to the intervention of strangers—not changes caused by the voluntary acts of the insurers themselves. Tried by this test the pursuers' averments were relevant, for they averred that the cost of restoring the vessel would be greater than her value after she had been restored.¹ The pursuers averred that the cost of raising and repairing the vessel would be £15,000, and that her value when restored would be only £9600. It might indeed be assumed that she could be restored for substantially less than £15,000, or at least that the defender thought she could be so restored, as otherwise the defender would have no interest to defend, since the value in the policy was £15,000 and the underwriters in any view would have to pay the whole cost of restoring her from the position of a ship at the bottom of the sea to that of a seaworthy ship. The question between the parties was this: The pursuers maintained that the whole expenditure necessary to restore the ship to the position of a seaworthy ship incurred on her from the time she sank was to be set against her value when restored; if that was the sound rule, then the pursuers would be entitled to prevail, at least upon the question of relevancy, since the defender did not, it was understood, dispute—at any rate the pursuers averred—that the amount of such expenditure would be greater than the value of the ship when restored. The defender on the other hand maintained that only such expenditure as had been or would be incurred on the ship after the raising of the action was to be set against her value when restored—that was to say in this case, as it happened, only such expenditure as had been or would be, incurred on her after she had been docked at San Francisco. In that view the pursuers admitted that the defender would be entitled to prevail, as they did not dispute that this limited expenditure would be less than the value of the ship when restored. The pursuers' view was the sound one. There was no principle and, apart from the authority, or supposed authority of the law of England, no authority, for the view that the insurers under a valued policy of marine insurance might by their own voluntary act—at it might be (as here) a very large expenditure—convert a total constructive loss into a partial loss, and so escape liability for the full sum in the policy. The defender appealed to the principle of indemnity, but the English rule (whatever its precise scope) was not based on the principle of indemnity, which was this, that the insurer was entitled to meet an action on the policy by an offer to restore the subject insured. That was not the English rule, and was inconsistent with the whole doctrine of total and partial loss. According to the English rule, in any view of it, the insurer, after the raising of the action, had no option to tender restoration of the subject, but must abide by the decision as to whether the loss at that date was total or partial. The principle of indemnity gave an intelligible rule—perhaps the best rule. It was also an intelligible rule to say that the rights of parties were to be fixed once and for all by the circumstances existing at the date of notice of abandonment, read it might be in the light of evidence emerging subsequently; and it might be a legitimate extension of that rule to hold that accident, or the intervention of third parties, even if occurring subsequently, should accrue to the benefit of the insurers. The English authorities, rightly construed, went no further. It was nothing else than an arbitrary rule to say that the insurers might by their own acts convert a total into a partial loss, provided they happened to be lucky enough to do so before an action was raised on the policy.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The law of Scotland on this matter was the same as the law of England, not because it was the law of England—the English common law that was to say—but because it was the rule of the general law maritime, as developed by the English Admiralty Court. There was an obvious convenience in the Scots Courts adopting the rules of the law maritime as developed in England. If indeed a rule on any particular point of maritime law, different from that recognised in England on the point, had been fixed as settled law in Scotland, the rule so fixed would continue to be the law of Scotland, notwithstanding the difference. Nothing said in the House of Lords in *Currie v. M'Knight*¹ was to be understood as implying that the Scots Courts were for the future to disregard any rules of maritime law hitherto recognised by them as settled, merely because these rules differed from the rules recognised in England; but *Currie v. M'Knight*¹ was an undoubted authority for the principle that where the English Courts had settled a rule on any particular point of maritime law and the Scots Courts had no rule on the point, the English rule was to be followed in Scotland. In the present instance there was, no doubt, the case of Robertson, Forsyth, & Co.,² as decided in the Court of Session; but although the judgment was affirmed on appeal, the grounds of judgment were not; and by Professor Bell the law of Scotland on the point had been assumed to be the same as that of England,³ and as appeared from the Lord Ordinary's opinion, the pursuers themselves made the same assumption in the Outer-House. The utmost that could be said of *Shepherd v. Henderson*⁴ was that the question, so far as Scotland was concerned, was treated as an open one. In such a state of the authorities the doctrine of *Currie v. M'Knight*¹ applied, and the English rule consequently ought to be followed.

(2) As to what that English rule was, there could, on the English authorities, be no doubt. None of the limitations suggested by the pursuers were recognised by the English decisions. The English rule was a perfectly general one, and was this:—That the question whether there was a total constructive loss was to be determined by the state of matters as at the date of bringing the action on the policy. Neither the cause nor the extent of the original loss, nor the state of matters at the date of notice of abandonment, was of any materiality; nor was the English rule confined to the rectification of mere errors of information; nor was it of moment that the state of matters was due to the action of the insurers themselves, and not to accident or to the intervention of third parties.¹ It might be true that most of the English decisions had been pronounced with reference to cases of recapture or cases of the restoration of derelict or stranded vessels, and that there had been few, if any, cases regarding sunken vessels. But that was not because of any rule of law, but simply because till a comparatively recent time the mechanical arrangements for the raising of sunken vessels had not been thought of.

(3) As a matter of principle the English rule was the sound rule, since it was founded on the principle of indemnity, or at least was a closer approximation to the principle of indemnity than the rule for which the pursuers contended. The sum in a valued policy was the standard of indemnity only in the event of it being impossible to tender the ship in such a state that she was capable of being repaired for a sum less than the value in the policy. To hold that the insurer was precluded from taking advantage of his own exertions, the intervention of third parties, or accident, to convert the ship into something worth repairing for less than the sum in the policy, was just to treat the policy as a wager policy pure and simple.²

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it is now settled in the law of England that a claim made under a policy of marine insurance, in circumstances similar to those presented in the case before us, must be determined by a consideration of the state of matters at the time when the claim is judicially made, and not as at the time of the occurrence out of which the claim arises. It has been stated recently on high authority that the law upon maritime questions is the same in Scotland as in England, and if this view, so broadly stated, is adopted, then we have nothing to do in this case beyond applying to it the rule which, I have said, is now settled in England. As matter of individual opinion I do not concur in that view. Nor do I think it could have been held by Lord Blackburn in 1881, when delivering his opinion in the case of Shepherd v. Henderson,³ for there, dealing with the very question we have now before us, he stated the law of England on the point, referred to it as a matter not yet finally decided in Scotland, and declined to express any opinion "as to how it would be in Scotch law."

In this case I arrive at the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, for several reasons. First, because there is no rule or principle in Scotland contrary to that which has been settled in England. The only case in Scotland on the point before us is the case of Robertson, &c. v. Stewart, &c.,⁴ and the decision in it was contrary to the English rule. That case was affirmed

¹ Bainbridge v. Neilson, 1808, 10 East, 329; Falkner v. Ritchie, 1814, 2 Maule and Selwyn, 290; Patterson v. Ritchie, 1815, 4 Maule and Selwyn, 393; *Brotherston v. on appeal,¹ but not upon the ground on which the Court of Session proceeded, that ground being neither approved nor disapproved in the House of Lords. I am unable to say that that one decision, pronounced nearly a century ago, can be regarded as settling a rule which in the administration of Scotch law we are now bound to follow. It is true that there is nothing to shew that that decision was ever questioned; it is equally true that there is nothing to shew that it was ever followed; and it is not improbable that underwriters and others interested in such questions may have regarded the decision as doubtful, because it did not receive the positive sanction of the House of Lords. It is noticeable that Professor Bell,² in referring to this case as one in which, on the general doctrine, the Court of Session had "entirely differed" from the law as laid down by the English Court, expresses no opinion on the question himself. There is nothing, therefore, beyond the decision of the Court of Session in *Robertson's case*³ which can be referred to in support of the argument that the rules of the Scotch law differ from that held in England. The law of both countries applicable to mercantile and maritime questions has been much developed since 1809, and that is another reason for declining to hold a single judgment pronounced in that year as fixing a rule binding upon us now. Second, where there is a well-settled rule on any question in the law of England, and no existing rule or principle in our law with which the English rule conflicts, it is desirable that the same rule should be followed here as there in order that there may not be conflicting rules on the same question prevailing in different parts of the same kingdom, and that even where the doctrine so settled differs from the rules of other states. Third, I think the application of the doctrines of the English law does give full justice to the parties here. To hold that the pursuers are entitled to claim for the loss actually suffered by them, and for nothing more (which is practically what the Lord Ordinary has determined), is a step towards recognition of the view, that in valued policies, as in all other policies of insurance, the contract is one of indemnity only. When valued policies are treated on any other footing, then they are really wager policies—a kind of policy which, for very good reasons, was declared illegal more than a century and a half ago.

LORD YOUNG.—I am also of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed. The only thing which I desire to say is that we must decide this question according to the law of Scotland, which is the only law with which we are supposed to be acquainted. If, as happens sometimes, a case ought in our opinion to be decided in accordance with English law, when, for example, the case relates to the construction of a will made in English form by an Englishman, we have recognised means for discovering what the law of England is. We can state a case and send it for the opinion of an English Court, or we can take the opinion of English counsel on the case, and so ascertain as matter of fact in the case what the law of England may be. We are very glad to be informed that the law of England is the same as the law of Scotland on any question. In the same way we are glad to know that the law of America or France is the same as ours in any case. It is desirable that the same rule should obtain

We do not know what the law of England is. We do not know the most recent views which have been taken as to what the law of England may be. We do not know what may have been decided in England yesterday or last week. We may discover that the law of England is the same as our law, but we must decide according to the law of Scotland. Here determining the case according to Scots law, I agree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be affirmed.

Macredie.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The general question which was argued to us, viz., whether the date of notice of abandonment or of the raising of an action is to be looked to in deciding whether a total loss has or has not been sustained, is still a moot point in the maritime law of Scotland. There is, indeed, one express decision upon the point, viz., *Robertson, Forsyth, & Company v. Stewart, Smith, &c.*¹ In that case the First Division of the Court, affirming the judgment of the Court of Admiralty and the Lord Ordinary, decided in favour of the shipowner, on the ground that the matter must be judged of as at the date of the notice of abandonment. It appears from the report of the opinions of the Judges that the Court considered the question to be entirely new. The judgment was appealed to the House of Lords and affirmed, but not upon the grounds adopted by the Court of Session, the ultimate ground of judgment being that the underwriters had accepted the notice of abandonment.² The case is interesting on account of the doubts expressed by Lord Eldon in the House of Lords as to the soundness of two English decisions,—*Bainbridge v. Neilson*³ and Falkner v. Ritchie,⁴—to the effect that the date of the action was the time to be looked to. But in the end the House of Lords waived deciding that question; and subsequently, notwithstanding Lord Eldon's doubts in Robertson, Forsyth, & Company v. Stewart & Smith and Others,¹ the cases of *Bainbridge*³ and *Falkner*⁴ were followed in England in a long series of cases. Therefore in England the law has been settled for more than half a century.

On the other hand, the law of many foreign countries, and in particular of France and America, is to an opposite effect.

As regards Scotland, the decision in *Robertson, Forsyth, & Company v. Stewart, Smith, &c.*¹ has not been repeated; neither has there been a decision to the opposite effect.

Mr Bell, in his Commentaries,⁵ contents himself with narrating the history of the case of Robertson,¹ and the course of decision in England, without expressing his opinion as to what the law of Scotland is or ought to be. In his Principles,⁶ in which he deals with the effect of notice of abandonment, he says,—“But before acceptance, if what appeared a total loss has become not so, as by recapture, recovery, or partial preservation, the policy then is for indemnity only of a partial loss.” But in support of this he only cites the English decisions, beginning with the case of Bainbridge

v. Neilson.¹ It may be inferred that Mr Bell regarded the matter as settled No. 156. by the current of the English decisions, but there is no later Scottish decision to support this view.

June 4, 1897.
Ship "Blair-

Limited, v.
Macredie.

The matter was very fully discussed in the recent case of Shepherd v. Henderson.² But the decision of that question was not essential to the judgment, because the Court of Session held that it was not proved that there was a constructive total loss at the date of the notice.

Lastly, there is no averment or evidence of practice in Scotland.

The point therefore being open, we have to decide whether we should follow the law of England or the law of France and America; we are free to take either course. There are weighty considerations on both sides. For those in favour of the date of notice, I need only refer to the note of the opinions of the Judges in the case of Robertson, Forsyth, & Company,³ and the opinion of Lord Craighill in Shepherd v. Henderson.⁴ But, on the other hand, there are counter considerations which, on the whole, I am inclined to think should prevail. We are not bound by the English decisions; but looking to our close commercial relations with England, and the fact that our merchant shipping law is regulated by a code applicable to both countries, it would be unfortunate if a different rule on this point obtained in Scotland from that established in England. There are other considerations pointing in the same direction which I need not mention in detail. On the whole matter, I think that, in the absence of any authority in our own law to the contrary, there are sufficiently strong reasons of expediency to lead us to adopt that of England.

So much on the general question; but I am further inclined to think that, on the terms of the policy, the same practical results would be realised.

The policy contains this declaration,—“And it is expressly declared and agreed that the acts of the insurer or insured in recovering, saving, or protecting the property insured, shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment.”

Now, the acts here specified are necessarily acts to be done after notice of abandonment has been given, and this seems to imply that, notwithstanding that notice of abandonment has been given, the insurers may do what they can before action raised to diminish their liability and reduce the loss without being held to have accepted the abandonment.

Therefore, I think we should hold that the third and fourth pleas for the defenders are well founded, and that as this action is laid upon the footing of the ship having become a constructive total loss, the action has been rightly dismissed by the Lord Ordinary.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

Succession—Vesting—Fee or Liferent—Direction to trustees to retain.—

By his trust-disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees after the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife, to "divide, or convey, or pay and make over the whole estate and effects then belonging to me . . . to and among my children equally, share and share alike, the lawful issue of any of them who may have predeceased taking the parent's share, it being provided in regard to the shares of my daughters that my trustees are hereby directed to hold the share of each daughter while unmarried in trust for her behoof in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, . . . and on the marriage of such daughter it shall be the duty and right of my said trustees to" settle the daughter's share in accordance with certain directions given by the truster, one of these being that a daughter having no children should have power to dispose by will of one-half of her share, "it being hereby expressly provided and declared that the remaining half of such share shall not vest in such daughter, but shall on her death fall to" the truster's other children.

A daughter survived both her parents, and died unmarried. Held that on the death of the truster's widow the fee of the daughter's share vested in her, subject only to the effect of the direction to settle her share in the event of her marriage.

By the third purpose he directed his trustees to pay the whole income of his estate (except so far as required to meet a provision in favour of his eldest son, John Christie Mackay, and certain annuities) to his wife Mrs Agnes Christie or Mackay, in liferent, for her liferent use only. By the ninth purpose it was provided as follows:—"Immediately after the death of the longest liver of us, the said John Mackay and Agnes Christie or Mackay (until which event happens no right to any portion of the estate and effects hereby conveyed shall vest in any of my daughters), my said trustees shall proceed to realise, so far as they shall deem necessary, the estates and effects hereby conveyed, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall occur three months after the death of the survivor of us, they shall divide or convey or pay and make over the whole estate and effects then belonging to me . . . to and among my children, except the said John Christie Mackay, equally share and share alike, the lawful issue of any of them who may have predeceased taking the parent's share; it being provided, in regard to the shares of my daughters, that my trustees are hereby directed to hold the share of each daughter, while unmarried, in trust for her behoof in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, the interest or annual produce thereof being payable to them respectively in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas; and on the marriage of such daughter it shall be the duty and right of my said trustees to take care that the share of the daughter so marrying shall be dealt with and provided for so that the same shall belong to and be held for behoof of the daughter so marrying, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, and as an alimentary fund for behoof of herself during her marriage; and also that, in case no child or children be born of her marriage, she shall have power to dispose after her own death of the capital sum invested for her behoof, and also of the interest or annual produce thereof, as she shall see fit; but that only, both as regards the capital and interest, to the extent of the one-half of the share of my estate accruing to her, it being hereby expressly provided and declared that the remaining one-half of such share shall not vest in such daughter or daughters, but shall on her or their death without children fall to and be divided among my other children or their issue, in such proportions as such daughter or daughters may direct by any writing under her or their hands; which failing, such share shall fall into and form part of the residue of my estate, and be divided among my other children (the issue of any of them who may have predeceased taking the parents' share), in the same way as is above provided for in regard to the division of the residue of my estate."

Mackay's
Trustees v.
Mackay's
Trustees.

The trustor was survived by his widow, and by four sons and three daughters. His widow died on 18th December 1885.

One of the daughters, Miss Mary Mackay, died unmarried on 14th August 1896, leaving a trust-disposition and deed of settlement and relative testamentary writings, under which her whole estate, including all estate which at the time of her death she was entitled to test upon, was conveyed to trustees, for certain purposes.

On the death of the trustor's widow his trustees had, at the request of the parties interested, continued to hold the trust-estate and divide the income among the beneficiaries.

On the death of Miss Mary Mackay a doubt arose as to whether the fee of a share of Mr Mackay's trust-estate was vested in her, and accordingly a special case was presented by his trustees, as parties of the first part, and Miss Mary Mackay's trustees, as parties of the second part.

The parties of the first part maintained that the fee of a share of Mrs Mackay's estate was not vested in Miss Mary Mackay at the date of her death, and was not carried to the second parties by her trust-disposition and settlement. The second parties maintained that Miss Mackay had a vested interest in the fee which was carried by her settlement, under the ninth purpose of her father's settlement, or otherwise that she was entitled to test upon her share. Alternatively they maintained that the fee of the share in question upon the death of Miss Mary Mackay lapsed and fell into intestacy.

The questions of law for the opinion and judgment of the Court were as follows:—“(1) Had the said Miss Mary Mackay a vested interest in the fee of a share of the said John Mackay's estate, under the ninth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement? (2) Had the said Miss Mary Mackay a power of disposal by mortis causa deed of the said share, or any part thereof? or (3) Does the fee of the said share, to any, and if so to what extent, fall into and form part of the residue of the trustor's estate? or (4) Does the fee of the said share lapse and fall into intestacy?”

The parties cited the undernoted authorities.¹

Mackay's
Trustees v.
Mackay's
Trustees.

LORD M'LAREN.—This cases raises a question which has come to be of considerable importance in the construction of wills, the effect of a gift of a share of residue to a son or daughter, followed by an instruction to trustees to hold or retain the share and to pay the income to the beneficiary for life.

The testator, John Mackay, left his estate for distribution to trustees. Under this trust-settlement his widow had a general liferent, and after making provision for payment of legacies and the disposal of the business in which he was engaged, in terms which it is unnecessary to consider, the testator provided in the ninth purpose of his trust for the division of the residue amongst his children. The ninth purpose begins by directing that immediately after the death of the testator and his wife ("until which event happens," he says "no right to any portion of the estate and effects hereby conveyed shall vest in any of my daughters"), the trustees should proceed to realise the estate, and at the first term thereafter it is said "they shall divide or convey or pay and make over the whole estate and effects then belonging to me" (with certain exceptions) "to and among my children, except the said John Christie Mackay, equally share and share alike, the lawful issue of any of them who may have predeceased taking the parent's share." Miss Mary Mackay, whose executors are the second parties to the case, was one of the truster's daughters, and if the trust purpose had stopped here, beyond doubt a share of the residue would have vested in her. But the deed goes on to provide in regard to the shares of daughters that the trustees are to hold the share of each daughter while unmarried in trust for her liferent use alienably, and to pay the interest half-yearly, and that on the marriage of such daughter her share is to be settled. As we are here concerned with the share of a daughter who died unmarried, the subsequent provisions have only an indirect bearing on the question, which is, stated shortly, whether the direction to the trustees to hold the share of Miss Mackay while unmarried in trust for her liferent use, and with a power to settle her share on marriage, amounts to a revocation of the gift of the fee contained in the immediately preceding words. Now, a construction which should treat one member of a sentence as annulling the immediately preceding and related member does not recommend itself as probably expressing what was in the testator's mind, and, least of all, when the subsequent gift is put as a proviso or condition of the first. But the two provisions may quite well stand together if we suppose that the testator, while giving his daughter a share of the capital, was desirous that her share should be held in trust, first, in order the better to secure to her an income for life, and secondly, to enable the trustees to carry out his purpose of settling the money in the event of the daughter's marriage. If this was the testator's intention, then it was not necessary that he should say anything on the subject of the disposal of the fee after the daughter's death, because he had already given her the fee, and by so doing had empowered her to transfer it by will or deed subject to her liferent. And again, it is an argument in favour of vesting under the direction to divide which I have quoted, that unless this direction is held to apply to Miss Mackay's share, there is no express disposal of the fee of her share in the event of her dying without issue. No. 157.

It was suggested in argument that when a fee is given, a direction to trustees to hold the capital in trust, and to pay the income only to the legatee, is ineffectual. If there had been no direction to settle the shares of daughters in the event of marriage, the observation would be well founded, because then Miss Mackay by bringing an action, or perhaps without an action, might have taken the management of her share into her own hands.

June 8, 1897.
Mackay's
Trustees v.
Mackay's
Trustees.

It was also suggested that the original gift or direction to divide the residue was not a substantive gift, but only an announcement of the principle of equal division as between the children. But this construction seems inadmissible when it is considered that the gift of residue is a gift to sons and daughters, and that so far as the sons are concerned it is the only gift in their favour.

In the present case it may be presumed that one reason, perhaps the chief reason, for putting the daughters' shares under trust, was to enable the trustees to fulfil the trustor's direction to settle the daughters' shares on marriage. A direction to settle on marriage would of course be effectual as a condition of the gift so long as the daughters' shares remained intact in the hands of trustees.

Such a direction is not necessarily inconsistent with the vesting of the fee. Miss Mackay's right was affected by this qualification during her lifetime because she never married, but the existence of the power to settle on marriage would not in my judgment affect Miss Mackay's right of disposing of the fee of her share by a deed or will taking effect after her death.

I may add that there is a considerable body of authority regarding the effect of an original gift with a direction to hold in trust superadded. In the very well considered cases of *Lindsay*¹ and *Dalglish*² the two things were held to be reconcilable. And again in two recent cases, *Greenlees*³ and Stewart,⁴ this principle of construction was generalised; and I think it must now be held that an original gift on partition of a residue amongst the members of a family will not be cut down to a life interest by the effect of a subsequent direction to pay the income to one or more of the objects of the gift for life. Of course there may be cases where the primary gift is so qualified in expression as to shew that no higher right is meant to be given than is more fully explained in the sequel, and no rule can be laid down which will dispense with the necessity of carefully considering the effect of all the clauses and provisions bearing on the right conferred. In the present case, my opinion is that Miss Mackay had a vested interest in the fee of her share of her father's estate, subject only to the effect of the direction to settle her share in the event of her marriage, and that the first question ought to be answered in the affirmative. The second question does not arise, and the third and fourth questions may be answered in the negative.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative and the third and fourth in the negative, and found that the second did not arise.

JOHN BENTON AND ANOTHER, Objectors (Respondents).—W. Campbell—M'Lennan.

Insurance—Policy—Construction—Insurance of Debenture in Mortgage Company—Failure to pay.—An insurance company guaranteed to B payment of £600 lent by him to a mortgage company on debenture, repayable on 1st June 1897, "in the event of failure to pay on the part of the debtors." The policy contained the conditions that B should pay a premium of £2, 5s. on 1st June in each year, and that the policy should be void in the event of a premium remaining unpaid for fourteen days.

In 1893 the mortgage company went into liquidation, and a reorganisation scheme was assented to by B in July 1894, the insurance company giving their consent in a letter to B, which bore, "This consent will not prejudice your claim under the insurance of your debentures of the" original mortgage company. By this scheme the assets and liabilities of the original mortgage company were transferred to the new company, and B exchanged the debenture which he held for the new company's debentures, which did not mature until 1904.

B did not pay the premium payable on 1st June 1895. In July 1895 the insurance company went into liquidation, and B lodged a claim for the amount of the debenture. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that there could be no "failure to pay" on the part of the debtors in the sense of the policy until June 1897, when the original debenture became payable, and that the policy had lapsed through B's failure to pay the premium due on 1st June 1895.

JOHN BENTON AND ALEXANDER MURRAY holding a debenture for £600 of the Equitable Mortgage Company, Limited, dated 26th May 1892, bearing interest at 5 per cent, and repayable on 1st June 1897, insured the same with the Employers' Insurance Company of Great Britain, Limited.

The policy bore that whereas Benton and Murray were the holders of the debenture mentioned, and were desirous of being insured by the Employers' Insurance Company, to the effect underwritten, "and there has been paid to the company the sum of £2, 5s., being the agreed on premium for such assurance for the period from the 26th day of May 1892 until the 1st day of June 1893, and it has been agreed that the sum of £2, 5s. shall be the future annual premium for such assurance thereafter, and that the same shall be payable on the 1st day of June in each year.

"Now these presents witness that the company, in the event of failure to pay on the part of the debtors, hereby guarantee to the assured payment of the said principal sum of £600 sterling within four months of the date when the same is repayable as above stated, and of said interest thereon at the rate above stated, within three months of the date when the same falls due from time to time, provided notice is given to the company of such failure to pay, in terms of the conditions indorsed hereon.

"Provided always, that this policy is subject to the conditions indorsed hereon, which are to be taken as part hereof, and are hereby declared to be conditions precedent to the right of the assured to sue or recover hereunder."

The conditions indorsed on the policy are, so far as necessary, given infra.^{*} No. 158.

The Equitable Mortgage Company went into liquidation on 30th August 1893 and a reorganisation agreement was entered into in March 1894, by which it was arranged that a new company—afterwards called the Equitable Securities Company—should be formed for the purpose of taking over the property and rights of the Equitable Mortgage Company. By this agreement it was provided, inter alia, that the new company should issue debentures to creditors of the old company who assented to the plan on their giving up their claims against the old company.

In July 1894 Benton and Murray, with the authority and consent of the Employers' Insurance Company of Great Britain,[†] assented to the plan of reorganisation, and exchanged the debenture of the old company which they held for ten debentures of £60 each in the new company, repayable in March 1904, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent.

Benton and Murray paid the premium upon their policy of insurance in June 1894, but did not pay a premium in June 1895. The Insurance Company paid them the interest due and unpaid upon their debenture down to 1st December 1894.

* The conditions indorsed on the policy provided, inter alia;—"1. This policy will be void . . . (b) If the premium is not paid within fourteen days after it becomes due. . . . (d) If the assured, without the consent in writing of the company, consents to any arrangement modifying the rights or remedies of the assured against the debtors or takes proceedings for recovering the principal sum assured or interest thereon. 2. If the debtors delay payment of any principal or interest for thirty days after the same ought to be paid, or if the debtors stop payment, have a receiving order made against them, become bankrupt, or are by the company known or believed to be in an unsound position, or if the company is called upon to pay any money under this policy, the assured shall, at the request and cost of the company, give to the company all such information as the assured may possess and the company may require as to the issue of the debentures hereby assured and the circumstances under which the assured took the same and the securities and rights available to the assured, and shall also at the like request and cost and upon payment by the company of the principal remaining due upon the debentures and interest at the rate within specified to date of payment, execute all such deeds and writings in favour of the company or its nominees, and do all such things as may be required by the company for vesting in them or their nominees all rights of the assured against the debtors and any property or person whatsoever, and the company may enforce any such rights or remedies in the name of the assured, but at the cost of the company. . . . 3. This policy shall continue from year to year so long as the assured shall pay the premiums hereunder on the days appointed for payment thereof, or before the expiry of fourteen days thereafter, but the company shall not be bound to accept any premium payable after the 1st day of June 1897, or in any way to continue this policy beyond the expiration of twelve calendar months from that date."

† A letter by the Secretary of the Insurance Company to Mr Benton, dated 23d July 1894, bore:—"Referring to scheme of arrangement dated 10th July 1894, and relative proxy, copy of which you will have received from the Official Receiver, we beg to advise that we have had same submitted to us. We approve of the same, and consent to your signing the proxy in favour of the passing of the scheme. Liquidators of
Insurance Co. of Great Britain,
Limited, v.
Benton.

In July 1895 the Employers' Insurance Company of Great Britain went into liquidation. Benton and Murray lodged an affidavit and claim with the liquidators for £603, 13s. 8d., representing the principal sum insured, with the addition of the difference in the interest payable by the old and the new companies from 1st December 1894 to 13th July 1895. In their claim they stated that they held no security other than the debentures of the new company.

The liquidators rejected the claim, "in respect of the claimants' failure to renew the policy in June 1895."

On 25th August 1896 the liquidators of the Employers' Insurance Company presented a note to the Court for the approval of their deliverances and for authority to pay a dividend.

Benton and Murray lodged answers and objections, in which they averred that when the Equitable Mortgage Company suspended payment and went into liquidation "failure to pay upon the part of the debtors" took place within the meaning of the policy, and the respondents' right to indemnity under the policy emerged. "The liability of the company in liquidation under their said insurance policy having . . . emerged long prior to June 1895, there was no obligation on the respondents to renew the policy in June 1895, as a condition of their claiming indemnity under the policy. The liquidators' proposed deliverance rejecting the respondents' claim in respect of the respondents' alleged failure to renew the policy at that date is therefore unsound in law." They accordingly craved the Court to direct the liquidators to admit their claim to ranking.

The liquidators lodged replies, in which they admitted liability for a sum of £2, 18s., representing the difference in the interest payable on the old and new debentures between 1st December 1894 and 1st June 1895.

On 14th May 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced an interlocutor disapproving of the deliverance of the liquidators, and recalling the same, directing the liquidators to admit the claim, and authorising them to pay the claimants a dividend, subject to transfer by the claimants to the liquidators of the ten debentures of the Equitable Securities Company, standing in their name, and to the claimants accounting for the interest drawn by them under said debentures.*

* "OPINION.—At the close of the argument in this case on 5th February I asked the parties to ascertain and inform me at what date the Equitable Mortgage Company, Limited, was, as stated in the objections for Benton, 'wound up and dissolved.' It was an American company, and therefore I could not construe the statutes for myself as I would have done if it had been a British company. I have waited three months for the information, and it is not forthcoming. I therefore propose to decide the case without it.

"The question is, whether the respondents have forfeited their rights under the policy of assurance dated 16th June 1892, by failure to pay a premium of £2, 5s. on 1st June 1895. That depends on whether there had been 'failure to pay' on the part of the Equitable Mortgage Company within the meaning of the policy prior to that date.

"I think there had been. The principal sum of £600 advanced by the respondents to the mortgage company was not repayable by the latter till 1st June 1897; but circumstances might quite well occur before that date, making it impossible for the debtors to discharge their obligation when the due date arrived. During the argument it seemed to me that no circumstance could have that effect more clearly than the dissolution of the mort-

The liquidators reclaimed, and argued ;—1. The sum insured was not repayable by the debtor until 1st June 1897, and the policy stipulated for payment of five yearly premiums as a condition of the insurance. The amount of the premium was calculated upon the footing that that number of premiums would be paid. There was no “failure to pay,” in the sense of the policy, until the date when the debenture became repayable,¹ and even if it was certain that there would then be a failure to pay on the part of the debtor, it was nevertheless the duty of the insured to go on paying the premiums gage company, and therefore I asked for the date of dissolution. But I think there is enough in the admitted facts to enable me to say that, whatever was the precise date of dissolution, there had been ‘failure to pay’ on the part of the company before 1st June 1895.

“It is admitted by the liquidators that the mortgage company had gone into liquidation prior to June 1894. Probably that circumstance did not by itself constitute ‘failure to pay,’ though it gave the insurance company a right under the second condition indorsed on the policy to make immediate payment of the principal with interest to date, and to demand an assignation of all the rights of the insured. But the liquidators further admit the respondents’ statements regarding what is called the ‘reconstruction of the company.’ These statements are that in March 1894 a new company called the Equitable Securities Company, Limited, was projected to take over the assets and liabilities of the Equitable Mortgage Company under a reconstruction scheme; that in July 1894 the respondents were authorised by the insurance company to accept, and did accept, ten debentures for £60 each from the new company, repayment being deferred till March 1904, and interest reduced to 4 per cent; and that the insurance company expressly agreed that the respondents’ acceptance of these new debentures should be without prejudice to their claim under the insurance of their original debenture with the mortgage company. This latter and most material point is amply borne out by a letter from the insurance company dated 23d July 1894. The effect of this transaction, to which the insurance company became a party, was to create a slightly altered debt and an entirely new debtor. The Equitable Mortgage Company, even if it continued to exist for some time afterwards, could no longer be called on to pay the old debt, for the parties had agreed otherwise, and it could not pay by any possibility, because it had parted with all its assets. There was therefore on its part from that moment ‘failure to pay’ the principal sum, though payment could not have been demanded till 1st June 1897. The risk, which is the characteristic feature of a contract of indemnity, was at an end, for it had become a certainty. The insured had acquired an indefeasible right to recover from the insurer. I fail to see how the respondents could forfeit the right which had thus vested in them by any subsequent act or default of theirs. It was enough that they had kept the policy in force up to the time when the liability of the insurance company arose. After that the company may have had the right (instead of paying up at once and ending the matter) to wait for the stipulated date, paying interest in the meantime. But during that interval there was, so far as I can see, no obligation on the part of the insured to pay premiums. It would, I think, require very special words in a policy of insurance to make premiums payable after the claim had emerged and become indefeasible, and I find no such words in this policy.

“It follows that the liquidators’ deliverance cannot be sustained.”

If the Lord Ordinary was right, the respondents would be better off than if the debtor had remained solvent, and the insurance contract was therefore made to give right to more than indemnity. 2. The plea that the sum due to the insured in respect of the deficiency of the interest received by them under the reconstruction scheme might be set off against the premiums was not stated in the respondents' answers. It was inconsistent with their claim, which included a demand for payment of that deficiency. Compensation could not be pleaded in this way in liquidation.¹

Liquidators of Employers' Insurance Co. of Great Britain,
Limited, v.
Benton.

Argued for the respondents;—1. Once it had been ascertained beyond doubt that the debtor could not pay, the risk became a certainty, and in the sense of the policy there was a failure to pay. The meaning of the policy was that the insurance would be renewed from year to year, provided that the new premium was paid. After the reconstruction scheme had been carried through, there was no longer an insurable risk, and there could be no obligation to continue the payment of premiums. The risk became a certainty in July 1894 through the arrangement made with the new company. This arrangement was entered into with the consent of the insurers, and the transaction amounted to an agreement on the part of the insurers to hold that there had been a failure to pay. 2. In any event, the insurance company owed the respondents more in interest than was due to them for premiums, and could not plead that the policy had become void through the premiums not being paid, as they were bound to apply the money in their hands to the payment of the premiums.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The two gentlemen who are respondents in this reclaiming note held a debenture of the Equitable Mortgage Company, which was repayable on the 1st of June 1897, and during the currency of which interest was payable at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. The respondents insured payment of these debentures with the Employers' Insurance Company of Great Britain, now in liquidation, and the obligations of the insurance company and the insured are set out in a policy of assurance which is before us. As I have said, the obligation of the original debtor was to repay the sum lent on 1st June 1897—then and no sooner—and it is natural to suppose, and in fact it is expressed in the policy, that the insurance company were simply to make good this obligation. They “guarantee to the assured payment of the said principal sum of £600 sterling within four months of the date when the same is repayable as above stated.” They also engage during the currency of the debenture,—that is, up to that period,—to guarantee interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent, within three months of the date when the same falls due from time to time. As the price of this undertaking by the insurance company, it is set forth that the sum of £2, 5s., being the agreed premium for such assurance for the period from 26th May 1892 to 1st June 1893, has been paid to the company, and that “it has been agreed that the sum of £2, 5s. shall be the future annual premium of such assurance thereafter, and that the same shall be payable on the 1st day of June in each year.” Now, it seems perfectly clear that the words of the policy necessarily relate to the original obligation of the original debtor, and to the parallel or identical No. 158. obligation of the insured.

I read this, therefore, as an agreement that, in return for these annual payments down to 1st June 1897, the insurers will see the principal sum then payable paid or pay it themselves, and so with regard to the interest falling due during the currency of the same period. The decision of the Lord Ordinary, and the contention of the respondents, is that, because, long before June 1897, the resources of the debtor became practically exhausted, there occurred a "failure to pay" in the sense of the policy. It would be much more accurate to say that it became apparent, at that earlier date, that a failure to pay was inevitable, but then it seems to me that the argument of the Lord Ordinary and the respondents ought to go the length of saying that the manifest impossibility of the debtor company being able to pay the amount of the debenture when it became due precipitated the obligation of the insuring company. The respondents, however, shrink from saying that, and accordingly they are forced to say that, while the contract of insurance continued down to June 1897 so far as the obligation of the insurance company was concerned, the other party was set free by the certainty that that obligation would be prestatable, and that while up to 1st June 1897 the one party was bound, the other was to cease paying premiums. It seems to me that that would be clearly contrary to the reciprocal obligations of the policy, and the language used as to the risk having ceased and a certainty having occurred seems to me to have no relevancy to the construction of the contract. There is nothing unintelligible or irrational in the particular contract to pay after the risk had been turned into a certainty. It may be illustrated as well by the case of a life policy as by any other. Suppose a policy of insurance binds the insurer to pay a certain sum at a certain date, in the event of a particular person failing to survive it, and binds the insured to pay annual premiums down to that date. If the person named in the policy dies before the date in question arrives, it becomes quite certain that the insurer will have to pay on its arrival, but the other party to the contract will none the less have to continue paying the premiums falling due at this late date.

Accordingly, I think that the Lord Ordinary is wrong.

With regard to the argument on compensation, I think it fails in several points. In the first place, it is directly contrary to the theory and terms of the respondents' claim, which is a demand for payment of money which they now say has been applied with their consent in payment of the premiums due under the policy. Then it is not pleaded in their answers, and there are other reasons which seem to strike with equal force against their contention. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be recalled, and the deliverance of the liquidators affirmed.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also entirely concur. I think this policy is a contract by which the company gave a positive undertaking to pay the sum of £600 on the 1st of June 1897 if the debtor company failed to pay upon that date, and provided the creditor paid certain specified annual premiums as the consideration for the insuring company's obligation. That seems to me the plain and obvious construction of the words of the contract, and it is made clear by a further and more specific statement of the conditions upon which the policy is to be void, one of which is that it becomes void if the premium is not paid within fourteen days after it becomes due.

Now, I agree with your Lordship, that the arrangement made between the creditor and the debtor, with the consent of the insurance company, had no effect either in accelerating the liability of the insurers to pay this sum so as to make it exigible before 1st June 1897, or in discharging the corresponding obligation of the insured to continue to pay the premiums if they desired to retain their right to demand payment. The insurers are barred by their consent to the new arrangement from maintaining that it relieves them of their liability. But they made no new contract with the insured. They are liable under their original contract according to its conditions, and not otherwise. I therefore quite agree in the result arrived at by your Lordship.

MRS MARGARET HOGG AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—C. J. Guthrie—D. Dundas.

Superior and Vassal—Entry—Corporation—"Managers and their successors in office."—The Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, incorporated by royal letters-patent, having purchased certain lands, the superior, by charter of resignation, disposed the lands "to and in favour of the managers of" the corporation "and their successors in office for the use and behoof of the said hospital and their disponees, heritably and irredeemably," and infestment was taken in these terms. Held that the entry so given was an entry of the corporation, and was not an entry of individuals as trustees for the corporation.

Campbell v. Orphan Hospital, June 28, 1843, 5 D. 1273, followed.

1st DIVISION.

IN 1897 the Earl of Lauderdale and others, the trustees of the Earl, superiors of four husband lands of Quixwood, in the parish of St Bathans, demanded a composition from Mrs Margaret Herriot Hogg and others, then proprietors of these lands, who had obtained an implied entry by the operation of the Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 4. These proprietors resisted the claim on the ground that apart from the implied entry the fee was full, the vassals being the corporation bearing the name of the Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, who obtained an entry in 1815.

A special case was presented by Lord Lauderdale's trustees, first parties, and by Mrs Hogg and others, second parties.

The case stated as follows:—By disposition dated 26th May 1806 John Balfour of Balbirnie, in consideration of £7000 paid to him out of the funds of the Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, disposed the lands "to and in favour of the managers of the said Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, and their successors in office, for the use and behoof of the said Hospital, and their disponees, heritably and irredeemably." No. 159.

June 10, 1897.
Earl of Lauderdale v.
Hogg.

By charter of resignation dated 27th December 1811 James Earl of Lauderdale disposed the lands to "the managers" in the same terms. The tenendas clause bore that the lands were to be holden by the said managers of the Orphan Hospital and Workhouse and their foresaids. The precept of sasine directed "sasine to be given to the said managers of the Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh and their foresaids."

Sasine was taken in these terms conform to instrument of sasine recorded 30th June 1815.

The Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh was in 1742 created an incorporation by royal letters-patent, and declared "as such corporation and by such name to have a perpetual succession."

It was further declared that the corporation should have full power to purchase and enjoy in fee for the use and behoof of the corporation, and to sell and dispose of, lands and other heritages.

It was also declared that the corporation should annually elect out of its members for the time being fifteen persons to be managers, who, or any five of whom, should have the management and direction of all and sundry the estates and effects, real and personal, and other interests and concerns of the corporation.

In 1839 the lands were sold by the then managers of the Orphan Hospital to John Allan, and by a variety of transmissions the property passed to Mrs Margaret Herriot Allan or Hogg and others, who became infest by notarial instrument recorded on 24th March 1873.

The Orphan Hospital and Workhouse still existed as a corporation. All the managers who held office in the year 1811 died long prior to 1st October 1874. It was admitted by both parties that one year's free rent of the lands amounted to £345, 7s. 5d., that if any casualty was exigible it was a composition, and that, in the event supposed, that sum would fall to be paid to the first parties by the second parties.

It was contended by the first parties that the last survivor of the vassals entered in 1811 having predeceased 1st October 1874, the second parties, as proprietors of the lands, were duly entered by the operation of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4; and that the casualty of composition was accordingly now due by them to the first parties as superiors of the lands.

The second parties, on the other hand, contended that the intention and effect of the charter of 1811 were to enter the corporation itself as vassal in the lands, or at all events to bar the superior from claiming any other or further payment by way of casualty during the subsistence of the corporation, and that, as the corporation still existed, the fee was full, and accordingly no casualty was due.

The question of law was,—“Is the said sum of £345, 7s. 5d., being a casualty of a composition, due by the second parties as proprietors of the said four husband lands of Quixwood to the first parties as superiors thereof?”

Argued for the first parties;—A composition was payable. The corporation had a corporate style under its letters-patent, and except

No. 159. by that style it could not be vested in property. The entry here was of the managers and their successors in office. *Campbell's case*¹ decided that an entry in these or similar terms was not an entry of the corporation, although in the special circumstances of that case the Court held that the superior was not entitled to demand a composition. In the *Drumsheugh Baths case*² no question on the construction of the title was raised or decided, both parties having assumed that the corporation there had been entered as vassal.

June 10, 1897.
Earl of Lauderdale v.
Hogg.

Argued for the second parties;—A composition was not payable, the corporation being still the entered vassal. The entry of the managers and their successors in office was an entry, or equivalent to an entry, of the corporation. The managers were not named, though that probably would have made no difference, and "successors" was not equivalent to "heirs." There were no individuals, therefore, on whose death the fee might be said to have become vacant. An entry of trustees and their heirs was quite different. That was expressly decided in Campbell's case.¹ It could not be said that on the death of a particular manager the fee was in any sense or to any extent in his hereditas jacens. There was a perpetual succession of managers, and until that came to an end, which would only be when the corporation came to an end, the fee remained full. The contention of the first parties would involve the payment of a casualty whenever there was a change in the managers; but that was absurd, as there was a change every year. Entries in similar terms to those in the present case had been held or assumed to be entries of a corporation.³

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case is whether the casualty of composition is exigible by the superior of certain lands; and the ground upon which his demand is maintained is that the lands have fallen into non-entry by the death of a vassal, who is no more specifically described than by saying that he was the last survivor of a number of persons who were entered as vassals in 1811, and that all of them predeceased the 1st October 1874. It is therefore in consequence of the death of the last survivor of a number of persons entered in 1811 that the superior says that the casualty of composition is now due, inasmuch as the lands are now held by disponees or the successors of disponees of those last entered vassals who had not obtained an entry from the superior before the passing of the Act of 1874. The answer is that in 1811 there was no entry of individual persons upon whose death the fee could become vacant, but that there was a good and effectual entry of a corporation which, as it is still in existence, is still the vassal duly entered. Of course if that be so, so long as the corporation exists, there can be no composition exigible from the present proprietors, who but for the Act of 1874 would be still in the position of subvassals under the corporation. No. 159.

Now, the question really depends upon whether the entry in 1811 was or was not the entry of a corporation. Mr Guthrie says, and I think quite rightly, that we are to consider that question upon the footing upon which this case is presented, viz., that there was a good and valid infeftment effected at that time. I am of opinion that it was the infeftment immediately under the superior of a corporation. The law with reference to the entry of corporations is perfectly well settled and clear. The superior is not bound to receive the corporation at all, because the perpetual existence of his vassal may deprive him of his right to casualties; but he may get rid of the disadvantage of having a vassal who never dies in two ways, as the writers on conveyancing point out. He may either make a stipulation which will give him an equivalent for the entries he would have enjoyed on the deaths of successive vassals, or he may enter individual persons as trustees. If he does that, the fee remains full so long as the individuals remain in life, and no longer, and upon the death of each individual or of the last of a number of individuals so entered, the fee passes to the heir of the entered vassal, and must be taken out of his hereditas jacens by his successor, who must complete a title in the ordinary way and on the same conditions as if the person entered as trustee had been proprietor of the fee in his own right. These are two ways in which the superior may obviate the disadvantage of having a corporation for his vassal. He may also, if he pleases, enter the corporation as such without making any special stipulations in his charter for payments in place of casualties, and the question is, whether that is not what the superior has done in this case. I think it is.

June 10, 1897.
Earl of Lauderdale v.
Hogg.

It appears to me that there are only two alternative views possible. Either this is an entry of a corporation, or of a perpetual succession of managers for a corporation, which appears to me to be pretty much the same thing, or it is an entry of individuals as trustees. It was suggested in the course of the argument that there might be some case between these two in the shape of an entry of individual managers for the time being and their successors in office, the effect of which, it was suggested, would be to put the successors of the managers actually in office at the date of the entry in exactly the same position as the heirs of individual persons who might be entered as individuals under an infeftment in favour of an individual and his heirs. It does not appear to me that that is a possible mode of completing a title. The entry must be either that of an individual with a descent on his death to his heirs, or that of a perpetual corporation involving no descent. In the case of an entry in favour of managers of an institution and their successors in office, I am unable to see how any successor in office can make up a title on the assumption that he is in the same position as the heir of an individual proprietor. The terms of the entry itself are such as to exclude the transmission to the heirs of the office-holder. There is nothing which can pass into his hereditas jacens so as to be taken up by his heir, because the title in his favour is so qualified as plainly to exclude his heirs. If that be so, it appears to me to be quite clear that an entry in such terms as we have here is not an entry of individuals as trustees and their heirs,

No. 159. so as to meet the case suggested by Lord Stair, where, with reference to adjudications, he says,¹—"Incorporations should pitch upon a person and assign their debt to him, expressly to the effect that the lands might be adjudged to him and his heirs for the use and behoof of the incorporation." June 10, 1897.
Earl of Lauderdale v.
Hogg.

I think that, upon a plain construction of the words here, even if there were no further authority upon the matter, it would be quite impossible to hold that an entry in favour of the managers and their successors in office is an entry of particular managers as individuals so as to give the superior casualties upon the death or delinquency of these persons.

But then, I think, there is perfectly sufficient authority to the contrary, and the case of *Campbell*² seems to me conclusive on that question. The question decided there was that an entry in favour of "William McLean and his successors in office for the time being, treasurers of the said corporation," was not an entry of a trustee on behalf of the corporation on whose death composition was exigible. That is the one proposition on which all the Judges are agreed. They differ to some extent as to the true feudal effect and technical character of the entry actually obtained, the Lord Ordinary saying it is the entry of the corporation, and the Lord Justice-Clerk saying that he was quite satisfied with the result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but that he could not concur in holding that the corporation had been entered, for he says that "if a society have a corporate style given to it, it cannot be correctly vested with property except by that technical name." Lord Medwyn says that the view of the Lord Justice-Clerk is nearly the same as that of the Lord Ordinary. "He proceeded upon the ground that it was intended to give entry to a corporation. I am quite clear that a conveyance to the treasurer of the institution and his successors is not the same as a conveyance to a trustee and his heirs." Lord Moncreiff gives no opinion as to whether there was an entry to the corporation, but he is quite clear that there is no entry of individual trustees. Therefore it appears to me that the case of *Campbell*² is an authority in favour of the vassals in this case.

I think that the case of *Hill*³ must be taken as an authority also, for although the question does not appear to have been expressly decided there was no doubt expressed in that case that a superior would be entitled to refuse an entry to and in favour of the managers of a corporation, and their successors in office, for behoof of the corporation, just because that would be an entry in favour of the corporation. And the same point was assumed in the case of the Drumsheugh Baths Company.⁴

I am therefore of opinion that the question put to us in this case ought to be answered in the negative, and that no casualty of composition is due, inasmuch as by the law in force before 1874, the present vassals would be still holding under the corporation of the Orphan Hospital as mid-superiors between them and the over-superior, and, that being so, the over-superior would not have been entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry because the fee would remain full so long as the corporation exists.

LORD ADAM.—The second parties to this special case are proprietors of No. 159. certain subjects called Quixwood. They were duly infeft in March 1873. The superior now comes forward and claims a casualty of composition on the ground that they are impliedly entered with him by the operation of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4. The superior's right to demand a composition depends on whether or not he could have brought an action of declarator of non-entry. That, again, depends on whether or not the fee is full, and to answer that question it is necessary to see what were the terms of entry of the original vassals. We find that by charter of resignation, dated 27th December 1811, James Earl of Lauderdale disposed and confirmed the lands in question to and in favour of the managers of the Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, and their successors in office, for the use and behoof of the said hospital, and their disponees, heritably and irredeemably. The precept of sasine directs sasine to be given to the "said managers of the Orphan Hospital and Workhouse at Edinburgh, and their foresaids," and infeftment was taken in these terms. The question is whether the managers of the Orphan Hospital still hold the fee of these subjects. I have no doubt that the title might have been taken direct to the corporation, but I am not surprised that it was taken to the managers, for I see that by the constitution of the hospital any five of them are to have the management of the estates and properties of the corporation. That being so, it was natural enough that they representing the corporation should be put into the title. However that may be, the question for us to decide is, whether a destination in the terms I have mentioned is to be read as a gift to the hospital, and whether or not the entry given is to the corporation qua corporation. I agree with Lord Kinnear both on principle and authority that it is so. The destination was intended to be, and is in fact, taken for the use and behoof of the corporation, and that being so, the entry is of the corporation. It is not necessary to go over the authorities again, but they clearly shew that that is the legal effect of such a destination. If that be so, then cadit quæstio—any further question falls, — for, as we know, a corporation never dies.

June 10, 1897.
Earl of Lauderdale v.
Hogg.

Even if this were not the correct view, there is another, namely, that if we are to read the terms of the destination as one to the managers, and their successors in office, the result is the same. The question is whether the destination implies a perpetual succession. I think it does. When you get a destination to successors in office, then so long as there are successors in office the fee remains full, and it is only when and if all die, and there comes de facto to be no successor, that the superior's right to a composition can arise.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Trustee v.
National Bank of Scot-

WILLIAM STIVEN (M'Laren's Trustee) AND GEORGE WILLSHER, Pursuers (Appellants).—C. K. Mackenzie—W. Thomson.
THE NATIONAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders (Respondents).—
Sol.-Gen. Dickson—John Wilson.

Process—Sheriff—Competency—Declarator of illegal preference—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 10—The Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. 19), sec. 9—The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 50), sec. 8 (2).—Held (dub. Lord Trayner) that an action praying the Court to find a certain payment by an insolvent debtor within sixty days of bankruptcy to be null and void at common law and under the Act 1696, c. 5, and to find that the payment was an illegal preference, and to set aside the same, was competent in the Sheriff Court.

Bankruptcy—Illegal Preference—Title to sue—Trustee under voluntary trust-deed.—Held (diss. Lord Young) that a trustee under a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors has no title to sue an action to set aside an illegal preference granted by the debtor to the prejudice of prior creditors who have assented to the trust-deed.

Fleming's Trustees v. M'Hardy, March 2, 1892, 19 R. 542, followed.

Held (1) that a prior creditor who alleges that he has been prejudiced by his debtor making a payment after insolvency, and within sixty days of his bankruptcy, has a title to sue for declarator that the payment is null, but (2) (diss. Lord Young) not to sue for payment either to himself or to a trustee for creditors.

Cook v. Sinclair & Co., July 2, 1896, 23 R. 925, followed.

Bankruptcy—Illegal and Fraudulent Preference—Retiring an accommodation bill before maturity—Act 1696, c. 5.—A bank discounted a bill for the drawer, who informed the bank that it had been accepted for his accommodation. Before the bill matured the drawer paid the bill in cash, and the bill was delivered to him. At the time of the payment the drawer was insolvent, and he became bankrupt within sixty days thereafter.

In an action brought against the bank by a prior creditor for declarator that the payment was illegal, it was proved that as at the time of the payment the bank had no knowledge of the drawer's insolvency, and had no reasonable ground for believing that he was insolvent, and that the retiring a bill before maturity was within the ordinary course of a banker's business.

Held that the payment was not an illegal preference within the meaning of the Act 1696, c. 5, and was not a fraudulent preference at common law.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfar.

IN October 1894 John M'Laren discounted with the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, at their branch at Hilltown, Dundee, a bill for £70, 10s., drawn by him upon and accepted by Andrew Gatherer, dated 18th October 1894, payable six months after date. At the date when the bill was discounted, or at all events some time before the bill was retired as after mentioned, M'Laren informed Scott, the bank-agent, that the bill had been accepted by Gatherer as an accommodation bill, and not for value.

On 13th March 1895 M'Laren was insolvent, and issued a circular calling a meeting of his creditors for 19th March 1895.

On 15th March 1895 M'Laren retired the bill, there being yet thirty-seven days of its currency to run, by paying cash to the bank, receiving 1s. 5d. of rebate and the bill. The bank had no other claim against M'Laren, the balance on his current account being, to the extent of a few shillings, in his favour.

On 19th March 1895 a meeting of M'Laren's creditors was held, and a trust-deed was granted by him for behoof of his creditors, William Stiven, accountant, Dundee, being the trustee. Creditors whose claims amounted to £1000, and who were creditors prior to the date when the bill was paid to the bank, acceded to the trust. No. 160.

On 4th May 1895 M'Laren was rendered notour bankrupt.

June 12, 1897.

In June 1895 Stiven, as trustee under the trust-deed, and George Willsher, wine-merchant, Dundee, a creditor of M'Laren prior to 15th March 1895, when the bill was retired, raised in the Sheriff Court at Dundee an action against the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, in which they prayed the Court,—“To find to be null and void at common law, and also under the Act 1696, c. 5, a transaction whereby the said John M'Laren transferred to the defenders on or about the 15th day of March 1895, a sum of £70, 10s., and to find that said transaction was an illegal preference, and to set aside the same, and to grant decree against the defenders ordaining them to pay to the pursuers, or alternatively, to the said William Stiven, as trustee fore-said, and as representing the creditors of the said John M'Laren, the sum of £70, 10s. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the said 15th day of March 1895.”

M'Laren's
Trustee v.
National Bank of Scotland, Limited.

The pursuers, in cond. 3, averred,—“The prepayment of said bill to the defenders, who knew of the insolvency and imminent bankruptcy of the said John M'Laren on the 15th day of March, was on the part of the said John M'Laren with the object of giving a preference to the defenders, and was entirely voluntary, within sixty days of his notour bankruptcy, and in satisfaction or further security of the debt of the said John M'Laren to the defenders, which was not due or exigible, and it is accordingly voidable under the Act 1696, c. 5. It was also collusive and fraudulent, and it was illegal and in prejudice of the rights of the said George Willsher and the other prior creditors who are represented by the said William Stiven.”

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The pursuers are entitled to decree as craved, because (a) the prepayment in question having been made by the said John M'Laren voluntarily within sixty days of his notour bankruptcy in satisfaction of a debt not then due or exigible, is voidable at the instance of the pursuers or one of them under the Act 1696, c. 5. (b) The prepayment being illegal and fraudulent and not in the course of business, but after suspension of payment, and in prejudice of the rights of the said George Willsher and of other prior creditors represented by the said William Stiven, is voidable at common law.

The defenders pleaded;—1. No title to sue. 2. The pursuers' statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the petition. 4. The transaction in question being payment of a debt for value received in the ordinary course of business, and not a voluntary deed granted either for the satisfaction or further security of the defenders, is not reducible under the Statute 1696, c. 5. 5. There being no fraud or collusion on the part of the defenders, the payment made to them is not reducible at common law.

A proof before answer was allowed.

The facts above narrated were proved. It was also proved that no notice had been given to the defenders or Scott of the circular calling the meeting of creditors, and that neither the defenders nor Scott were aware at the time of the payment that M'Laren was insolvent, nor had they reasonable grounds for thinking that he was insolvent; that the retiring of a bill before maturity either by the drawer or acceptor thereof by payment of its contents was well known in banking business and of not infrequent occurrence, and was a transaction within the ordinary course of the business of a banker.

No. 160. On 4th July 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . (5) Finds it not proved that the payment in cash now sought to be set aside was contrary to the Act 1696, c. 5, or that it was fraudulent at common law; (6) Finds separatim that the leading pursuer took the estate of the truster tantum et tale as he possessed it, that he is possessed of no rights in it that did not belong to John M'Laren, and that John M'Laren could have had no title to sue the present action: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

M'Laren's
Trustee v.
National Bank of Scotland, Limited.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson) dismissed the appeal, and adhered to the interlocutor appealed against.*

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—I. By getting payment in cash of an immature bill the defenders had acquired a preference over the other creditors to which they were not entitled by law. The transaction was (1) null and void under the Act 1696, c. 5. In order to avoid the operation of the Act it behoved the defenders to shew that the transaction fell within one of the three recognised exceptions as being (a) a cash payment; or (b) a payment in the ordinary course of business; or (c) a novum debitum. Now, the third exception was not pleaded, and the transaction could not be said to fall within the first and second exceptions. It was not a cash payment of a debt due and prestable, which it was admitted¹ would be effectual in the absence of fraud, and it was not a payment in ordinary course. The only period at which in the ordinary course of business a creditor could legally demand payment of a bill (and that was the test to be applied) was at its maturity. Payment of a bill some weeks before its maturity was not a payment in ordinary course. Even if the transaction were held to be one in ordinary course, that did not make it good if there was collusion on the debtor's part in order to give a preference,² and it was not necessary to the operation of the Act that the creditor should be proved to have been in knowledge of the debtor's impending insolvency.³ It was enough if the debtor inclined to favour him and give him a preference over other creditors. Here, knowing himself to be insolvent, M'Laren, two days after he had issued his circular to the creditors, retired the bill with the defenders when there were still thirty-seven days to run upon it. That was just such a preference as the Act struck at.⁴ *Loudon Brothers*⁵ had no application, unless the Court could come to the conclusion that there was no intention to give a preference. (2) The transaction was null and void at common law. II. The pursuer Stiven had a good title to sue the action in the interests of the creditors whom he represented, and in any view Willsher's title was good. He was a prior creditor, and was entitled to reduce the transaction and to have the money restored to the general fund.³

* "NOTE.— . . . When the defenders discounted the bill they practically bought it. When the contents of the bill are paid before expiry, it is bought back again, the bank making a rebate or allowance off their original discount in proportion to the unexpired currency of the bill. Such a transaction is in the ordinary way of banking business, and I do not think that it can be said that the defenders took payment by way of deposit as security."

Argued for the defenders;—(1) As regarded the Act 1696, c. 5, the case fell within the first two exceptions. The transaction was a cash payment, and in the ordinary course of business. The defenders got no advantage from being paid by M'Laren, because they could look to Gatherer.⁴ If there was any preference it was one in Gatherer's favour. It had been nowhere decided that a cash payment of an immature bill was outside the ordinary course of business. It was proved in this case that retiring a bill before maturity by the drawer or acceptor by payment of its contents was a transaction in the ordinary course of a banker's business. The fixed term of payment was adjoined to the bill solely in the debtor's interest, and it did not prevent his paying the bill sooner if it suited him to do so.⁵ In retiring the bill, then, before its maturity, there was nothing outside the ordinary course of business, and there was therefore no preference to the defenders in contravention of the Act 1696, c. 5.⁶ Further, the Sheriff was right in holding that the transaction was a novum debitum. The bill was a negotiable instrument, and M'Laren had bought it from the bank. The cases of Blincoe's Trustee,⁷ Mitchell,⁸ and Speir,⁹ were cases where the debtor deposited money in bank in order to meet bills when they became due. They obviously did not apply here, where M'Laren had paid for the bill and taken it away with him. In *Guild's case*¹⁰ all the Court said was that some payments in cash might be struck at by the Act. *Tamplin's case*¹¹ was like *Speir's*⁹ case, a case of deposit. (2) The transaction was not challengeable at common law. No fraud had been proved on M'Laren's part, or any interest to give an undue preference to the defenders. (3) The trustee had no title to sue the

Trustee v.
National Bank of Scotland, Limited.

The cause was taken to avizandum, but was subsequently put out for further hearing on doubts suggested by Lord Trayner as to the competency of the action.

Argued for the pursuers;—The action was not such an action of reduction as was incompetent in the Sheriff Court. It was not an action to reduce a deed with penal consequences for non-appearance. It was an action with petitory conclusions for restoration to the status quo ante. It was competent under the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 and 1857,* and so far as it was an action of declarator, it was also competent under the Sheriff Courts Act, 1877.†

Argued for the defenders;—The action was incompetent so far as regarded the reductive and declaratory conclusions. If the title to sue was upheld, it was not disputed that the action was competent so far as regarded the petitory conclusions.³

LORD YOUNG.—(After stating the facts)—There is no objection upon record to the competency of the action. There is an objection to the title to sue. The case was argued before us upon its merits, and when we had the case at avizandum we thought it fitting that there should be an opportunity given to the parties to discuss the question of the competency of the action at the instance of those parties in the Sheriff Court, and the case was accordingly put out for hearing upon that matter, and I think it will be necessary for us to express our opinion upon it, for if the action is incompetent of course there are no merits which can be dealt with.

I am of opinion that there is a title to sue, and I am of opinion that the action is competent. The ground upon which a doubt occurred as to the

The Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. 19), sec. 9, enacted,—“The tenth section of the first hereinbefore recited Act” (the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79) “shall be taken to apply to actions and exceptions as well in the ordinary Court of the Sheriff as in the Court of Session.”

† The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 50), sec. 8, enacted,—“The jurisdiction powers and authorities of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute of Scotland shall be, and the same are hereby extended to . . . (2) actions of declarator for the purpose of determining any question relating to the property in or right of succession to moveables where the value of the subject in dispute does not exceed £1000.”

competency was that this is an action of reduction, and that a reduction of this kind is not competent in the Sheriff Court, and that as to an action for payment, the trustee under a voluntary trust for creditors, although the creditors accede, takes tantum et tale with the truster, and that he cannot sue an action on the ground that this payment, which the truster could not have challenged, he having made it himself, was contrary to the Act of 1696 or contrary to the common law. My opinion is against that contention. I think, in the first place, that a reduction is not necessary in order to challenge a preference as being contrary to the Act of 1696, cap. 5, or contrary to the rules of the common law. It is enough to have an action in which it may be shewn that the preference complained of was a preference given contrary to the provisions of the statute, or contrary to the rules of the common law. There is no deed to be reduced; there is no fact to be established except that the circumstances were such that the Act of 1696 applies to the payment, and that it was contrary to the provisions of the Act, or that the payment was fraudulent and a violation of the rules of the common law. I see no objection to the facts necessary to establish either of these propositions—there being no deed in the way which requires to be removed—being established without the necessity of a reduction. Indeed, there is nothing here to reduce but only an averment of facts which require to be established, shewing, as the pursuer contends, that the payment which he complains of and seeks restoration against was a violation of the statute or of the rules of the common law. Even if there had been a deed to set aside or a deed standing in the way, I think it is now quite established under recent legislation and in practice that in the Sheriff Court the Sheriff can inquire as to the propriety of granting a deed under circumstances averred and established, and as to whether or not it should be disregarded, without the necessity of a reduction to set it aside and declare it to be null and void, extinguishing the deed and putting it out of existence. I think there is abundance of authority for that. But there is no deed here, and there is therefore nothing to be established in the case at the instance of the trustee for creditors whose debts were due prior in date to the payment, restoration of which he seeks, except facts which shew that money was paid to the defenders in the case contrary to the statutory rule or contrary to the common law rule, and that he ought to have the money for distribution among the creditors. The consent of the whole creditors would not be necessary; in a matter of competency it is sufficient that any prior creditors are parties to the action. If the Sheriff-substitute was of opinion that the trustee had no title as representing prior creditors, I entirely differ from him. I think that a trustee who represents prior creditors who have committed their estate, or the estate which is liable to them for the payment of their debts, to his management for their behoof, has a title to sue in any matter of this kind in which they are interested. He suing for behoof of the creditors who had assented to the trust would have a title to bring an action against any debtor to the estate. It is not a voluntary trust revocable by the truster, for it is assented to by the creditors and exists for their behoof and has been acted upon. They have omitted a proceeding which they might otherwise have taken for their behoof, but if there were any technical difficulty through that (I am of opinion that there is none) it

Trustee v.
National

Therefore, being of opinion that the action is competent, as the parties originally assumed it to be, stating and pleading nothing to the contrary, we have to consider whether the judgment of the Sheriff on the merits is or is not well founded, and that question is just, whether upon the facts as established—for there has been a proof—we can affirm cond. 3. I am of opinion that we cannot. In any challenge of a proceeding of this kind I think we must look to the truth and substance of the matter, and I think that the substance of the matter is that this accommodation bill, which the bank's customer got his father-in-law to accept, was neither more nor less than a security to the bank for the payment of the balance of his account due to them. It did not pay that balance. If the bill had run on to maturity, and had been paid, then it would have paid the balance to the amount of it; but if not paid, it paid nothing, and was in substance merely a security in the hands of the bank. I have noticed the fact that, as matter of book entry, it was entered in the bank as discounted to M'Laren, and the amount put to the credit of his account. Well, I think that is provisional, and would not interfere with the substance of the thing. It was not meant, and I think could not legitimately be held in practice that the bank was in any different position from this, that they had M'Laren as their debtor for £70, 10s., with an accommodation bill accepted by his father-in-law in security of the debt. I may just observe in passing that if M'Laren had gone to the bank and paid £70, 10s. towards the extinction of the debt due by him on his account, there could have been no possible challenge of that under the Statute of 1696 or at common law, and when he goes to the bank and says that his father-in-law desires to have back that accommodation bill and states that he is willing to pay the £70, 10s. on the bill being given to him, I think he was in the exercise of his right. I do not inquire how he got the money; he may have got it in a manner which was not in the exercise of right, but he was possessed of the money, and he was entitled to go to the bank and say, "I want that bill given up, and here is the amount, the whole amount of it." And the bank were entitled—I do not consider whether they were bound, although I rather incline to think that they only acted legitimately, and would not have acted legitimately if they had acted otherwise—to give up the bill on payment of the whole amount, even six weeks before they could have enforced payment of the bill. I think there is a great deal in the Sheriff's view that this was merely a purchasing of that bill by M'Laren for cash for the full value of it. I think that is the substance of it, and that in that there is nothing contrary to the Act of 1696, and nothing fraudulent at common law which would entitle us to set aside the transaction, or rather, I should say, entitle prior creditors, or their trustee, legitimately acting for them, to have restoration of the money so paid.

I am therefore of opinion here upon the facts as averred, and upon the evidence on which these facts rest, which must be judged of by us in this concluded case, that no case has been made out entitling the pursuer to have this payment set aside or the prayer of this petition granted. The way to have set aside a payment of this kind is to have the money restored. I think the term reduction is not very applicable to it except in the familiar enough sense of reduction—restoration. There is nothing to reduce ; there is only restoration of the money, which is payment of the money. And that is the conclusion here ; the summons seeks for decree against the defenders, ordaining them to pay to the pursuers, or alternatively to William Stiven, as representing the creditors of the said John M'Laren, the sum of £70, 10s., with interest from a certain date. The facts upon which that conclusion rested must be established to the satisfaction of the Court before the payment prayed for can be ordered. I am of opinion that the facts entitling them to that order or decree for payment have not been established, and that therefore the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed, this appeal being refused, with expenses.

No. 160.

M'Laren's
Trustees v.
National Bank of Scotland, Limited.

I should like to say that I think there is no declarator here, and no declarator is necessary. There is a conclusion in the petition—a superfluous conclusion in my opinion—to find that the payment was contrary to the statute, and contrary to the common law. I think a finding to that effect is just a finding in law, and that the proper conclusion in the prayer is the latter part of it, to conclude for payment to the pursuers of the sum mentioned. In an interlocutor proceeding on a proof the Sheriff would have to find in point of fact so-and-so, and find in point of law that the payment was in violation of the statute and against the common law. I think that is no declarator in the proper sense, but merely a finding in point of law.

LORD TRAYNER.—The doubts which I expressed in the course of the debate as to the competency of this action as laid have not been removed, but as I understand none of your Lordships share in my doubts, but, on the contrary, are of opinion that this action is competent, I do not think it necessary to say anything on that subject. On the question of title to sue, I do not concur in the views expressed by Lord Young. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer Stiven had no title to sue this action as laid, and that the pursuer Willsher had no title to sue or insist in the petitory conclusions. These questions, I think, are decided by the cases of *Fleming's Trustees*¹ and Cook.²

On the merits of the action I agree with the result at which the Sheriffs have arrived. It is not proved, in my opinion, that at the time when the bill in question was retired the defenders or their agent Mr Scott knew that M'Laren was insolvent, or had reasonable ground for believing him to be so. At that date the balance on his account with the defenders was at his credit. I regard the payment made to the defenders on 15th March 1895 as a cash payment of a debt due although not then exigible, but a payment at the same time which the defenders were not entitled to refuse. I think it is (as a general rule) the right of every debtor to pay off his obligation and insist upon a discharge of it before the date on which the creditor could exact payment or performance, provided the period fixed for performance has not been so fixed in the interest of the creditor. Here the date of payment on the bill was a date fixed in the interest of the debtor, and of him alone, and the benefit thus conceived in his favour he was entitled to

No. 160. renounce. Accordingly I think M'Laren, who was an obligant on the bill in question to the defenders, was entitled, before the expiry of its currency, to take it up, and the defenders could not refuse to take payment and deliver up the bill. I am satisfied also that the defenders, in receiving payment from their debtor, and delivering up the bill before it had matured, were acting in the ordinary course of their business. Such a transaction (although not so frequent as the retiring of bills on their due date) is quite well known, and not infrequent—so well known and recognised that banks have a fixed rate of rebate which is paid to the debtor retiring his bill before maturity. I would be slow to impose on the bankers the duty, in every case where a debtor proposes to pay his bill before maturity, of inquiry into the circumstances of their debtor before they accepted payment, with the risk that if they did not do so the transaction might be held to be an illegal preference. In this case I think there was a cash payment made by a debtor to his creditor in the ordinary course of business, and such a payment is not struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5. I think further that there is no room for the suggestion that this transaction was a fraud at common law.

Trustees v.
National Bank of Scotland, Limited.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am not prepared to hold that the petition is incompetent. It is true that the trustee, being a trustee under a private trust-deed, who has not obtained the consent of all the creditors, has no title to sue—Fleming's Trustees v. M'Hardy,¹ and it is also true that here the private creditor has no title to demand payment to himself or to the trustee of the sum sued for—Cook.² But quoad ultra the pursuer Willsher, the private creditor, has a good title to insist on the remaining conclusion of the action, provided that conclusion is competent and separable, and not merely ancillary to and dependent upon the petitory conclusion.

Now, admittedly reduction is not competent in the Sheriff Court, and until 1877 actions of declarator were also incompetent in the Sheriff Court. But I do not read the first part of the prayer of the petition as a conclusion for reduction. Reduction is not necessary; there is no deed to be reduced, and the prayer consists merely of what is in substance a declarator that the transaction in question amounts to an illegal preference, and a prayer that it should be set aside. This, I think, is competent in the Sheriff Court under section 10 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1857, and section 8 (2) of the Sheriff Court Act of 1877. In regard to the latter statute, it is true that the creditor is not entitled to payment of the whole sum sued for, but he has an interest in that sum, and the statute says that actions of declarator shall be competent in the Sheriff Court for the purpose of determining any question of property in moveables where the value does not exceed £1000. It may be that the pursuer, the private creditor, might have to institute further proceedings before he could make his right good, but I think that he was entitled to sue the action to the effect of having the preference declared null.

The only defenders called in this action are the National Bank of Scotland, and the only transaction which is sought to be reduced is a payment of retiring a bill due five weeks later, viz., 21st April 1895, on which his name appeared as drawer, and that of his father-in-law, Gatherer, as acceptor. June 12, 1897.

M'Laren's
Trustee v.
National Bank of Scot-
land, Limited.
Clearly this was a bill drawn for the accommodation of M'Laren.

The result of the authorities is that payment by anticipation by a person insolvent of a debt not yet exigible may or may not, according to circumstances, be reducible under the Act 1696, c. 5, or at common law. Prima facie, a payment so made indicates an intention to give the creditor a preference. But this presumption, such as it is, can be redargued, and if it can be shewn that the payment was made in the ordinary course of trade, or of the dealings between the parties, it will stand.

If this had been simply a payment of a debt due to the bank, there is a considerable body of evidence to shew that M'Laren was insolvent when he made it, and knew himself to be so; that the payment was not made in the ordinary course of dealing; and that it was made for the protection of Gatherer, the acceptor on the bill. But in order to the reduction of such a transaction, it must be shewn that the creditor has received a preference, and on this point I think the pursuers' case against the bank fails. The bank did not merely receive payment of a debt and discharge it; they held a document of debt upon which Gatherer's name appeared as acceptor, and this document they gave up to M'Laren in return for the sum in the bill. Now, it is not proved that Gatherer was not good for the money, and if he was good for it the bank gained nothing by the transaction. The preference, if preference there was, was one in favour not of the bank but of Gatherer, who is not a party to this action.

Given another good name on the bill and ignorance on the part of the holder of the drawer's insolvency, such a transaction cannot be set aside quoad the holder—Mitchell v. Rodger, 1834.¹

If, however, it were proved that the bank were aware of M'Laren's insolvency, and were parties to a transaction by which Gatherer was benefited at the expense of M'Laren's other creditors, the transaction could not stand. On this point I confess I have felt some difficulty. There are passages in Mr Scott's own evidence and in his letters which the appellant's counsel relied on with some force, as indicating that Mr Scott knew, or should have known, that M'Laren was insolvent; and the question is, whether it is proved that this knowledge amounted to certainty or merely to suspicion. On the whole, I do not think it is proved that he knew that M'Laren was insolvent, and therefore the bank must be assoilzied.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to the title to sue I agree with the opinions of Lord Trayner and Lord Moncreiff. If the case had to be decided on its merits, I would agree with the opinions of all your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors appealed against: Find in fact (1) that in or about the month of October 1894 the now deceased John M'Laren discounted with the defenders, at their branch office, Hilltown, Dundee, a bill for £70, 10s., drawn by him upon and accepted by Adam Gatherer, Laurencekirk, dated 18th October 1894, and payable six months after date; (2) that the said John M'Laren, at the date when the said bill was discounted, or at all events some time before said bill was retired as after mentioned, informed David Peebles Scott, the defender's agent at their said branch office, that said bill had been accepted by the said Adam Gatherer as an accommodation bill, and not for value; (3) that on 13th March 1895 the said John M'Laren was insolvent, and issued a circular calling a meeting of his creditors, to be held on 19th March thereafter, and that he was rendered notour bankrupt on 4th May 1895; (4) that on 15th March the said John M'Laren retired the foreshaid bill, there being yet thirty-seven days of its currency to run, by paying in cash to the defenders, at their said branch office, the full amount of said bill, less the amount of 1s. 5d., being the rebate to which he was entitled on account of retiring said bill before maturity, and that said bill was then delivered to him; (5) that when said bill was retired as aforesaid no notice had been given to the defenders or their agent, Mr Scott, of the circular which had been issued calling a meeting of M'Laren's creditors, and that neither the defenders nor their agent, Mr Scott, were aware that M'Laren was insolvent, nor had reasonable grounds for thinking that he was insolvent; (6) that the retiring of a bill before maturity, either by the drawer or acceptor thereof, by payment of its contents, is well known in banking business, and of not infrequent occurrence, and is a transaction within the ordinary course of a banker's business: Find in law (1) that the pursuer William Stiven, as trustee under a voluntary trust-deed granted by the said John M'Laren, has no title to sue this action; (2) that the pursuer George Willsher, as an individual creditor of the said John M'Laren, has no title to sue or insist in this action to the effect of obtaining decree in terms of the petitory conclusions of the petition; (3) that the payment of £70, 10s. to the defenders by the said John M'Laren as aforesaid was not an illegal preference within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 5, and that such payment was not a fraudulent preference at common law: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

Revenue—Income-Tax—Public Free Library—"Buildings used solely for the purposes" of Institution—Subscription Library—Exemption—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 61, No. 6.—Section 61, Rule 6, of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, exempts from duties under Schedule (A), "any building the property of any literary or scientific institution, used solely for the purposes of such institution."

In the buildings of the Dundee Free Library accommodation was given to books belonging to the Dundee Subscription Library, and the expenses attending their safekeeping and circulation among the subscribers were defrayed out of the revenues of the Free Library. In consideration of the accommodation and services so given, each book, after being in circulation for a year, became the property of the Free Library. No. 161.

June 16, 1897.

Held that the buildings in question did not fall within the above exemption, inasmuch as they were not used "solely" for the purposes of the Free Library. Inland Revenue v.
Magistrates of Dundee.

AT a meeting of the General Commissioners of Income-Tax for the Dundee District of the County of Forfar, held at Dundee on 3d December 1896, the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee appealed against an assessment, under Schedule A of the Income-Tax Acts, for the year 1896-97, on £500 made upon them as occupiers of a portion of the buildings known as the "Albert Institute," Dundee. 1st Division.
Court of Exchequer.

It was contended on behalf of the Magistrates and Town-Council that the Albert Institute buildings, being used as a free library, reading-room, museum, and permanent art gallery, without any payment demanded or made for admission, or for any instruction afforded by lectures or otherwise therein, they were exempt from taxation.

The Surveyor of Taxes contended that the Albert Institute did not come within the exemption granted under the above recited Act, in respect that in one of the rooms of the Free Library, and under the control of the librarian of the Free Library, there was a Subscription Library of 1500 volumes, with a membership of about 220, each member paying an annual subscription of one guinea; that the subscribers appointed a committee of management annually, and the books of the library, after being one year in circulation, were then handed over to and became the absolute property of the Free Library.

The Commissioners, after hearing parties, discharged the assessment. Thereupon the Surveyor of Taxes asked and obtained a case for the Court of Exchequer. The case stated as follows:—"The Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee are the proprietors of the property known as the Albert Institute, in the city of Dundee, which is administered under sections 18 to 27, both inclusive, of the Public Libraries Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1887.

"The Public Libraries Acts for Scotland were adopted by the town of Dundee in the year 1866, and since then the Albert Institute buildings have been occupied (except in so far as otherwise occupied) and administered by the Free Library Committee, duly appointed annually under and for the purposes of the Public Libraries Acts.

"In 1876 a Subscription Library was formed by a number of gentlemen in Dundee. The subscription was £1, 1s. per annum; and by the third rule of the rules of the Dundee Subscription Library it is provided that 'The chief librarian and clerk of the Free Library Board shall act as librarian and clerk of the Subscription Library, the books of which shall be in his custody.' Rule 4 provides that 'The Committee of Management to be elected by the subscribers at the annual meeting shall consist of thirteen persons, of whom the Provost shall be chairman, the treasurer shall be a member ex officio, four of the members to be elected must also be members of the Free Library Board for the time being (if they are subscribers), and seven shall be chosen from the general body of the subscribers.' Rule 12 provides that 'The books of the Subscription Library shall be kept separate

No. 161. from those of the other libraries, and also marked with a distinctive label for twelve months after their purchase, at the expiry of which time they shall be stamped with the seal of the Dundee Free Library and Museum, and all right and property in them on the part of the subscribers shall cease and determine; it being understood that in consideration thereof the expenses attending their circulation and safe-keeping shall be defrayed from the ordinary revenues of the Free Library Board.'

June 16, 1897.
Inland
Revenue v.
Magistrates of Dundee.

"The books belonging to the Subscription Library are kept in a public room of the Albert Institute buildings, not reserved for the members of the Subscription Library, but open to and used by the public. These books occupy four, and rarely five, of the many bookshelves in the said room. They never exceed 1500 in number. On the other shelves in that room there are over 15,000 books of the Free Library Lending Department.

"Any member of the public wishing a book from the Subscription Library for any special literary purpose at once gets it on application to the librarian as a matter of favour, but not as a matter of right; and there is not, on the part of the members of the Subscription Library, any exclusive possession of any room whatever."

The question for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer was—"Whether, in the circumstances above mentioned, the Albert Institute, Dundee, or any part thereof, is exempt under section 61 of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35?"

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In accordance with the *Manchester*¹ case, the building in question is the property of the Free Library of Dundee, established under the Public Libraries Acts; and the question is whether it is used solely for the purposes of that institution.

In my opinion, the case shews distinctly that it is not. It is used also for the purposes of another institution, viz., the association or club which owns the Dundee Subscription Library. That society consists of people who are not content with the books of the Free Library, and buy with the subscription of the members other and I suppose newer books. The society have an arrangement with the Free Library by which the Subscription Library is housed in the buildings in question, and gets the services of the chief librarian of the Free Library, in return for which it hands over each book it buys after retaining it for a year only. This seems a very sensible arrangement for both parties. The Subscription Library getting house room and services for nothing is able to devote the whole of the subscriptions to the purchase of books, while the Free Library gets in return some £220 worth of books each year. It is a very suitable friendly treaty between two literary institutions; but it has no effect in identifying the two, which are necessarily distinct.

The only theories upon which it could be said that to use the building for the purposes of the Subscription Library is to use it for the purposes of the Free Library are two,—(1) It is said that, as the rent paid in books for room and services is applied to the Free Library, the use is for its purposes. But this would prove too much, for it would equally apply to the money rent which might be paid by a chess club or a lodger. (2) It is suggested that reading, or the promotion of reading, is the purpose of the Free Library. This seems to me much too vague. I think the purposes of the institution, in the sense of the Act, are the purposes of the Free Library of Dundee, as a concrete literary institution, which pursues its ultimate object according to its statutory constitution. Lending out to guinea subscribers books bought with funds not belonging to the Free Library, and according to the rules of a private society, is not one of the purposes of a Free Library established under the Free Libraries Acts.

Inland
Revenue v.
Magistrates of Dundee.

I am for reversing the decision of the Commissioners and sustaining the assessment.

LORD ADAM.—In this case the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee appealed against an assessment laid upon them under schedule A of the Inland Revenue Acts as occupiers of a portion of certain buildings known as the “Albert Institute,” Dundee. The Commissioners sustained the appeal, and we have now to say whether their determination was right.

The appeal was rested on that part of rule 6 which allows an abatement “on any building the property of any literary or scientific institution used solely for the purposes of such institution.”

It appears from the case that the buildings in question are the property of the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee, and are used for the purposes of the Public Free Library.

Having regard to the Manchester Free Library case in the House of Lords, I am constrained to hold that the Public Free Library is a literary institution, and that the buildings in question are, in the sense of the Act, the property of that institution, although feudally vested in the Magistrates and Town-Council.

But to entitle to exemption it must be further shewn that the buildings are used solely for the purposes of such institution, i.e., of the Public Free Library.

It appears that there is in Dundee another institution called the Dundee Subscription Library, which has upwards of 200 members, and who acquire about 1500 volumes annually.

These volumes are accommodated in the buildings in question. They remain the exclusive property of the Subscription Library for one year, and are under the custody of the chief librarian and clerk of the Free Library Board, who acts as librarian and clerk to the Subscription Library. It appears to me to be clear that the buildings are used for the accommodation and for the purposes of the Subscription Library, and therefore that they are not used solely for the purposes of the Public Free Library.

The arrangements with the Subscription Library may probably be an advantageous one for the Free Library, but I do not think that we have anything to do with that—the only question, as I think, being whether the buildings are used solely for the purposes of the Free Library. I do not think they are, and on that short ground I think that the determination of the Commissioners is wrong.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

June 16, 1897. Revenue—Stamp—Conveyance on Sale—Decree under Heritable Securities
Tod v. Inland Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 44), sec. 8—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Revenue. Vict. c. 39), secs. 54, 57, and 62.—Held that an instrument for completing a feudal title in the form of an extract of a decree by a Sheriff under section 8 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, declaring the debtor's right of redemption under a bond and disposition in security to be extinguished and the creditor vested in the property at a price under the sum due on the bond, was not a decree whereby property was transferred "upon the sale thereof" in terms of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was accordingly not liable to an ad valorem duty, but that it fell under section 62 of the Act, in respect that it had the effect of transferring and vesting in the creditor, otherwise than by sale or mortgage, a right of property which had previously been vested in the borrower, and was liable accordingly to a stamp-duty of ten shillings.

1st DIVISION. DAVID TOD of Eastwood Park, Renfrewshire, the holder of a bond Court of and disposition in security, obtained in January 1897, under section 8
Exchequer. of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, a decree in absence from the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, declaring that the debtors had forfeited their right of redemption, and that the pursuer was vested in the security subjects as absolute proprietor. With the view of completing his title in terms of the statute by recording an extract of the decree, Mr Tod submitted an extract of the decree to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for their opinion as to the stamp-duty with which it was chargeable.

"The Commissioners were of opinion that the decree of Court in question was chargeable, in terms of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, with ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale, and that under section 57 the sum upon which such duty was chargeable was £27,000, which sum is set forth in the instrument as the 'price' of the subjects. They accordingly assessed the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty of £135 upon the instrument."

Mr Tod declared himself dissatisfied with the determination of the Commissioners, "on the ground that the instrument was not a 'conveyance on sale' within the meaning of section 54 of the Stamp Act, in respect that the property in question was not 'upon the sale thereof' vested in him by the instrument, but that, on the contrary, it had vested in him on the recording of the bond and disposition in security, and all that the decree did was to take away the debtor's right of redemption, with the consequence that his right became absolute. He therefore contended that the extract decree, if subject to any duty, was subject to only the deed-duty of 10s.," and required a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The case stated the question to be,—“Whether the said instrument, in the circumstances above set forth, is liable to be assessed and charged with the said ad valorem conveyance on sale stamp-duty; or, if not, with what other duty, if any, it is liable to be assessed and charged?”

The case set forth the terms of the instrument, being an extract of No. 162. the decree in absence,—“At Glasgow, the 26th day of January 1897, in an action in the Sheriff Court of the county of Lanark, at Glasgow, June 16, 1897.
Tod v. Inland
Revenue. at the instance of David Tod, Esq., of Eastwood Park, Renfrewshire, pursuer; against—[here the names of persons representing the debtors in the bond were given]—defenders; the Sheriff in absence found and declared that the defenders had forfeited the right of redemption reserved to the granters in a bond and disposition in security for the sum of £22,000 sterling, dated . . . and that the said right was extinguished as from and after the said date hereof, and that the pursuer had right to and was vested in All and Whole . . . as absolute proprietor thereof, but subject always to the burdens, . . . at the price of £27,000 (the sums due under the said bond and disposition in security at the term of Whitsunday 1896, being £28,483, 2s. 2d.), and decerned; and granted warrant to record this extract decree in the Register of Sasines.—Extracted at Glasgow, this 9th day of February 1897, by me, Sheriff-clerk-depute of Lanarkshire.—ALEX. PEARSON, Sheriff-clerk-depute.”

The case contained no statement of the circumstances in which the decree had been obtained.

The Heritable Securities Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 44), sec. 8, enacts,—“Any creditor who has exposed for sale under his security the lands held in security, at a price not exceeding the amount due under the said security, and under any prior security, and any security or securities ranking pari passu with the exposor's security (exclusive of the expenses attending the exposure or prior exposures), or at any lower price, and has failed to find a purchaser, may apply to the Sheriff for decree in the terms of Schedule D hereto annexed, and the Sheriff may after service on the proprietor and on the other creditors, if any, and after such intimation and inquiry as he may think fit, grant such application and issue decree in the said terms. On such decree being pronounced, and an extract thereof, in which said lands shall be described at length, or by reference, recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines, the right of redemption reserved to the debtor shall be extinguished, and the creditor shall have right to the lands disposed in security in the same manner and to the same effect as if the disposition in security had been an irredeemable disposition as from the date of such decree, and upon registration of an extract of such decree in the appropriate register the lands shall be disencumbered of all securities and diligences posterior to the security of the said creditor; or instead of granting such decree the Sheriff may, upon any such application being made to him as aforesaid, appoint the lands held subject to the security to be re-exposed for sale at a price to be fixed by him, and in that event the said creditor shall have right to bid for and purchase the said lands at such sale; and in the event of the creditor purchasing, the Sheriff may issue decree in the form and to the effect aforesaid, or the creditor may grant a disposition of the lands to himself in the same manner as if he had been a stranger.”

Schedule (D) annexed to the Act is in these terms:—

“The Sheriff having resumed consideration of the said petition, finds and declares that X Y [the debtor in the bond] has forfeited the right of redemption reserved to him in the said bond and disposition in security, and that the said right is extinguished as from and after this date, and that A B [design him], the petitioner, has right to, and

No. 162. is vested in, the lands described in the said bond and disposition in security, dated and recorded as aforesaid, as absolute proprietor thereof, but subject always to the burdens and conditions contained or referred to in the said bond and disposition in security at the price of £ [here mention the price at which the lands were last exposed, or the price at which the lands have been bought in, as the case may be], and decerns; and grants warrant to record the decree to be extracted hereon in the Register of Sasines."

Tod v. Inland
Revenue.

"Note.—The extract decree is to describe the subject."

By the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 39), there are charged the following stamp-duties, viz. :—

(a) "Conveyance or transfer on sale of any property (except such stock as aforesaid) :

"Where the amount or value of the consideration for the sale does not exceed £5, £0 0 6" and so on.

"And see sections 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61.

(b) "Conveyance or transfer of any kind not hereinbefore described, £0 10 0 and see section 62."

In the body of the Act the said sections 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61 occur under the head "Conveyance on Sale," and the said section 62 occurs under the head "Conveyances on any occasion except sale or mortgage."

Section 54 of the Act is as follows :—"For the purposes of this Act the expression 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument, and every decree or order of any Court or of any Commissioners, whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof, is transferred to or vested in the purchaser, or any other person on his behalf, or by his direction."

Section 57 of the Act is as follows :—"Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty."

Section 62 of the Act is as follows :—"Every instrument, and every decree or order of any Court or of any Commissioners, whereby any property on any occasion, except a sale or mortgage, is transferred to or vested in any person, is to be charged with duty as a conveyance or transfer of property; provided that a conveyance or transfer made for effectuating the appointment of a new trustee is not to be charged with any higher duty than ten shillings."

Argued for the appellant;—The instrument fell under neither sections 54 nor 57 of the Stamp Act of 1891. (1) It was not a "conveyance on sale."¹ The appellant had the real interest in the subjects under section 8 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, and he only required the decree of the Sheriff to vest him in the indefeasible and irredeemable right to them. That decree did not convert the bond and disposition in security into "a conveyance on sale"; indeed, the decree was only pronounced after the failure to sell. (2) The 57th section was inapplicable,¹ because there was here no conveyance and no transfer. Moreover, the section did not impose a duty. Section 62 was the section which exactly applied to the decree, as it had the effect of transferring and vesting in the appellant a right of property which had previously been vested in the borrower.

Tod v. Inland Revenue.

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—Taken together, sections 54 and 57 covered the case. [LORD KINNEAR.—A sale is a consensual contract where property is transferred for a price. You have here property transferred, and also a price, but where is the consensual contract?] There was a consensual contract to this extent that the creditor was entitled to use the remedy which the law allowed him. The instrument bore ex facie that the property was acquired for a price. This was a "conveyance on sale," and nothing else.²

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Proceedings under the 8th section of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act of 1894 are novel, but they are simple and intelligible. Given a bond and disposition in security, and an unsuccessful exposure under the power to sell, and the Sheriff may declare the right of redemption extinguished and the creditor vested in the lands. The question which we have to determine is, whether the Sheriff's decree to this effect is a decree upon a sale.

Prima facie, there is no sale. On the contrary, the decree is pronounced because there is no sale. It is impossible to say when, where, and to whom the sale took place upon which the decree is pronounced.

It was attempted to evolve, out of the combined effect of the bond and disposition and the decree, something which could be called a sale. This seems to me much too far-fetched, and is inconsistent with the business-like views of the Stamp Act itself. In one view (and that is the view of the argument) a bond and disposition in security itself may be represented as a conditional sale. But the Act sharply distinguishes from sale the class of contracts embodied in security writes, and groups them under the title "Mortgage." The question therefore comes to be whether the unsuccessful exposure to sale and the application to the Sheriff constitute a sale in the sense of the 54th section; and I am of opinion that those words are entirely inapplicable. The case is provided for under section 62, which contemplates a class of decrees importing conveyances which are not on the occasion of a sale or mortgage.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is, what is the amount of stamp-duty payable on the instrument set forth in the print. Now, that instrument is an extract decree by the Sheriff of Lanark, by which he found and declared—(Reads). That is the instrument in question in this case. Now, that decree, it appears to me, is in entire conformity with the terms and provisions of the 8th section of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894, and as your Lordship has said, the proceeding being somewhat novel, the instrument was laid before the Commissioners to ascertain what stamp was exigible, and the Commissioners were of opinion that the decree of the Court in question was chargeable, in terms of the 54th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, with ad valorem duty. The question for us is whether that determination is right or wrong. On that I agree with your Lordship that this instrument does not fall within the 54th section of the Act, which it is said to do by the Commissioners. Of course the conveyance on sale there described is said to include every instrument and decree of Court "whereby any property or any estate or interest," &c.—(Reads). Now, the question is whether this is a transfer on a sale. I can find with your Lordship no evidence of sale in the matter. We should naturally look in the case of sale for a seller. Who is the seller? There is no disposition contained in this instrument at all, no conveyance by any seller whatever. There is no disponee. All that is done by this instrument is that the Sheriff, under powers conferred upon him, has declared a certain right of reversion forfeited. That does not appear to me to partake at all of the character of a transfer on sale. Therefore I agree with your Lordship that the determination of the Commissioners in this case is wrong, and that the case falls expressly within the 62d section of the Act, which provides—(Reads). It is by a decree of the Court, and not a sale at all, that this property is declared to be vested in the proprietor. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think it clear that the right arising to the creditor under the 8th section of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, is not a right which arises from sale. A sale of land is a consensual contract by virtue of which the seller becomes bound to convey the land which is the subject-matter of the contract to the buyer for a price, and the conveyance on sale must be a conveyance which is executed in the performance of such a contract. There is no such contract here. The appellant acquired a totally different kind of right from the original owner of the property. He acquired a right in security only, which is a totally different thing from the right of property acquired by a purchaser upon a sale. Then the Heritable Securities Act comes in and gives him what your Lordships have described as a novel remedy, and which certainly is a remedy which did not belong to creditors by the law of Scotland before the passing of that statute. The statute provides a new and very ready method by which a creditor may be enabled to make the subject of a security available for the payment of his debt, and in the application of that method he has obtained a decree from the Sheriff extinguishing the right of his debtor—the right of the owner of the land—and vesting the right of property in the creditor. That appears to me to be certainly not a right arising upon a sale, for the reasons which your Lordships have already given. It is agreed by both parties that it is not a conveyance upon a mortgage, but nevertheless it is a decree which has the effect of transferring and vesting in the appellant a right of property which had previously been vested in another person,—that is, in the borrower. It appears to me, therefore, that it falls directly under the language of the 62d section of the statute, and that the duty No. 162.

chargeable must be in accordance with that section.

missioners were of opinion that, although the management was nominally located in Norway, the vessel was really controlled and managed by the appellants in Glasgow, and accordingly refused the appeal."

J. Wingate & Company obtained a case for appeal.

The following facts were stated in the case:—

"(1) The barque 'Chanaral' is owned by a limited company registered in Christiania, and is not on the register of any port in the United Kingdom.

"(3) The share list is kept in Christiania, whence all share certificates are issued; but these are not valid until confirmed by the signature of James Wingate & Company, who own twenty-three of the ninety-five shares into which the capital of the company is divided. Seventy of the remaining shares are held by shareholders resident in Scotland, and two by the managers in Norway.

"(4) By article 5 Messrs Bernard A. Ellingsen and Narve Ellingsen, of Christiania, are elected managers, with the first named as director; but chartering, and all voyage receipts and disbursements, are dealt with by Messrs James Wingate & Company. Messrs Ellingsen attend to all the requirements of the Norwegian company law, and have power to negotiate freights in Norway. They have also appointed the captains and crew.

"(5) The appellants (James Wingate & Company) have effected the whole of the chartering. They also keep the accounts and intromit with the whole funds, having paid, on behalf of the management from the profits of the first voyage, direct to the shareholders the one dividend (30 per cent) yet paid. Messrs James Wingate & Company have received and retained all funds until required for payment of expenses or dividends.

"The books of the company are kept in Norway, and are compiled from the statements transmitted from Glasgow by Messrs James Wingate & Company, who keep the accounts here.

"(6) The 'Chanaral' is an old vessel, having been built in 1862, and purchased from Messrs T. R. Shallcross & Company of Liverpool. She has never been in Norway since the present owners bought her.

"(7) Under the freight charters which appellants entered into without consulting the management in Christiania, the first voyage began at Rotterdam, embraced London, Mauritius, Abrolthos Islands, and Queenstown, and ended at Liverpool."

By the articles of association of the company, which were appended to the case, it was provided,—“Sec. 1. The Shipping Coy. 'Chanaral' the aim of which is to carry on trade, is a limited liability company. The share capital of the company is Kr. , divided into shares, each Kr. , which are fully paid up. . . .

"Sec. 3. The management is situated in Norway, and is registered in Christiania.

"Sec. 4. The management consists of two Norwegian shareholders elected for one year at the time of the ordinary general meeting. The general meeting decides which of the elected managers is to act as director of the management. . . .

"Sec. 6. No share is valid without being signed by the managers, and also confirmed by the signature of the firm James Wingate & Coy., Glasgow. . . .

"Sec. 9. The director of the management gets 1 per cent of the gross amount of every freight, and has therefor to keep account and office, and pay the other manager.

"Sec. 10. All the chartering is done by the firm of James Wingate & Coy., and in Norway by the director, for which he is paid the usual full commission, &c. No. 163.

"Sec. 11. The managements pay dividends after each round voyage is ended, reserving a sufficient amount to cover all usual running expenses for the next voyage. June 16, 1897.

"Sec. 12. The ordinary general meeting is held annually in Christiania, after notice being given a fortnight previous. . . .

"Sec. 13. The extraordinary general meeting is held at Christiania as often as the management considers it necessary, or the owners of at least one-half of the share capital demand same, after a fortnight's previous notice. . . ."

Argued for the appellants;—The case shewed that the company was neither resident in the United Kingdom nor did it carry on its trade there. It was incorporated and registered in Norway, its office and books were there, and its managers were Norwegians. Its trade could not be said to be in this country, for although the appellants effected the contracts of affreightment, they could do nothing without the sanction of the managers in Norway.¹ On either of the alternatives of the argument for the Crown, the mode of assessment was wrong. If the Crown were right in arguing that the company was not resident in Scotland, but carried on trade there, the form of assessment was wrong, for the company should, under section 41 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, have been assessed as represented by the appellants in the capacity of agents, not the appellants as individuals. If, on the other hand, the Crown were right in arguing that the company was resident in Scotland, then the company should have been assessed directly.

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—Under Schedule D they could assess the company either as resident here or as carrying on their trade here. (1) The company was not Norwegian. No doubt it was registered in Christiania, but the holders of ninety-three of the shares resided here, and the whole business of the ship was carried on in Glasgow.² (2) Alternatively, while the company was resident abroad, its business was carried on here. The form of assessment was right under section 41. It was well known that the appellants were the agents for the ship, and it was thus unnecessary to state expressly that they were the agents.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion the facts found in this case prove to the hilt that wherever this company resides, and in whatever other places it may exercise its trade, it at least exercises that trade in Glasgow. The company is (I quote from the bye-laws) "a shipping company, the aim of which is to carry on trade." From this it might be inferred, but the laws of the company also plainly say, that its profits are made by contracts of

No. 163. affreightment: and it seems to own only one ship, the "Chanaral." The case succinctly states what is done in Glasgow—"The appellants (James Wingate & Company) have effected the whole of the chartering. They also keep the accounts and intromit with the whole funds, having paid on behalf of the management, from the profits of the first voyage, direct to the shareholders, the one dividend (30 per cent) yet paid. Messrs James Wingate & Company have received and retained all funds until required for payment of expenses or dividends." Even supposing that any show could have been made of trade exercised elsewhere, it seems to me that these facts prove affirmatively that the trade is exercised in Glasgow. But, in fact, no such operations are carried on anywhere else.

Wingate & Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

These things being so, and the company being, prima facie, a Norwegian company, the Revenue authorities very naturally assessed the Messrs Wingate as the agents of a non-resident company. Their right to do so depended on the combined effect of Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act of 1853 and the 41st section of the Income-Tax Act of 1842, and was necessarily based on two propositions of fact,—(1) That Wingate & Company were in receipt, as agents of the "Chanaral" Company, of profits accruing to the company from trade exercised at Glasgow; and (2) that the "Chanaral" Company were not resident in Great Britain. It is perfectly plain that both are necessary, and that it is only if the principal is not resident in the United Kingdom that there is any warrant for assessing the agent.

Unfortunately, the Revenue authorities and the Commissioners seem to have lost sight of this, and in the debate before us the argument for the Crown at first was that the company was truly resident at Glasgow, and not in Norway. I mention this untoward history merely for the purpose of saying that, while my opinion is that, on the facts stated, this company is not resident in Scotland, this question was never properly argued, except in so far as the two Crown counsel might be regarded as contradictors of one another. My opinion on this point is rested simply on these grounds—the company is constituted under Norwegian law; its registered office is in Norway; there are kept its books; there the ship is registered; and there two of its principal officers reside. It is true that the vast majority of its shareholders are British, and that its business is in the main conducted in Glasgow. But, on the other hand, Great Britain is the centre of the carrying trade of the world, and the best point from which to run a vessel, however owned; and although it may well be conjectured that equally legitimate reasons might have led to the registration of the company in this country as to its registration in Norway, still I am unable to disregard the fact that, prima facie, this is a Norwegian company, and I do not find adequate grounds for holding that in fact it is resident in Great Britain.

It is perhaps necessary to say that, assuming the 41st section to apply, the assessment seems right enough in point of form. It might perhaps be still more correct to lay the assessment on Messrs Wingate expressly as agents for the company; but I do not think that the statute is departed from when they are assessed for the profits of the "Chanaral" without their relation to the company being expressly specified.

I am for refusing the appeal.

LORD ADAM.—The appellants Messrs Wingate & Company appealed against an assessment made upon them under Schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts in the sum of £505 in respect of the barque "Chanaral."

No. 163.
June 16, 1897.
Wingate & Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

The assessment, as I understand, was imposed under the second branch of Schedule D, which enacts that income-tax shall be payable for and in respect of the annual profits and gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any trade exercised within the United Kingdom.

The "person" in this case to whom the profits are said to have accrued is a limited company called the Shipping Company "Chanaral," to whom the barque "Chanaral" belonged. This company is said not to be resident in the United Kingdom, and the assessment has been imposed on Messrs Wingate & Company as being the factors or agents of the company in terms of the 41st section of the Income-Tax Act of 1842. The case seems to raise two questions of fact—(1) Whether the company has its residence out of the United Kingdom? for unless it be so there is no warrant for imposing the assessment on the Messrs Wingate & Company; (2) Whether it carries on trade within the United Kingdom?

With reference to the first of these questions, it appears that the company is a liability company registered at Christiania according to the law of Norway, and having its registered office there; that the share list is kept there, whence all share certificates are issued; that two gentlemen, Messrs Ellingsen of Christiania, are the managers of the company, who attend to all the requirements of Norwegian law and have power to negotiate freights in Norway, and that the books of the company are kept there. It further appears from the articles of association that the annual general meetings of the company are held at Christiania, and that extraordinary general meetings are also held there. That being so, I cannot doubt that this company has its residence in Christiania, and is not resident in the United Kingdom. I think it is also clear that it carries on business or trades within the United Kingdom.

The following facts are found in the case, viz., that the "Chanaral" has never been in Norway since the company bought her; that the appellants have effected the whole of the chartering, and that the freight charters were entered into by them without consulting the management in Christiania; that they have kept the accounts and intromitted with the whole funds, and have received and retained all funds until required for payments of expenses or dividends.

In these circumstances it appears to me not doubtful that the company, through their factors or agents, the appellants, have traded within the United Kingdom, and apparently hitherto within the United Kingdom only, although that is not material, and that profits or gains have accrued to them from the exercise of such trade, and that therefore they are chargeable under Schedule D in respect of such gains.

The company not being resident in the United Kingdom, section 41 of the Act of 1842 directs how the assessment shall be imposed in respect of such gains. It enacts that the company shall be chargeable in the name of any factor or agent, in the like manner and to the like amount as if the

No. 163. company were resident in the United Kingdom, and in the actual receipt thereof.

June 16, 1897.
Wingate & Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

The assessment bears to be imposed in respect of the profits of the barque "Chanaral." It is not disputed that the appellants are factors or agents of the company. I think therefore that the company were chargeable for these profits in the names of the appellants, as was done.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners should be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

Hope.

JOHN ALFRED HOPE, Defender (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell—Clyde.

Agent and Principal—Brokerage—Purchase of iron—Carrying over—Averaging purchases—Broker acting as principal.—A employed an iron broker to buy in Glasgow iron market 1000 tons of pig-iron for himself, and 500 for B. The broker on 25th August bought 1000 tons from Fullarton at 46s. 7d. per ton, and 500 from Dick at 46s. 9½d. He allotted 500 of the first lot, and the whole of the second lot to A, and 500 of the first lot to B, at 46s. 8d. as the average price of both lots. An advice-note sent to A bore this price, and gave the names of Fullarton and Dick as the sellers.

At the end of a month, when the price fell to be paid, and the warrants to be delivered, A not having provided funds to take up the warrants, the broker did so with his own funds, and "carried over" in one of the modes usual in the Glasgow market, thus:—He filled up a bought-note in his own name as purchaser from A of the 1000 tons at 49s. 3d. (the market price of the day), payable that day, and at the same time filled up a sale-note in his own name as seller to A at the price of 49s. 6d. payable at the end of a month,—the 3d. extra charged per ton being to cover store rent and interest for the month. Those notes were sent to A, with an account shewing the difference between the original price at which A bought and the market price at the date of carrying over.

Similar transactions followed, adverse differences being put to A's debit.

In an action raised by the broker against A for the balance of his account, A, with reference to the purchases for average prices, pleaded that no such contracts had been made with the sellers, that they could not have been enforced by him against them, and were not binding on him. With reference to the carrying-over contracts he contended that the broker was not entitled without his authority to depart from his position as broker and act as a principal in dealing with him.

It appeared from the advice-notes and letters sent to the defender that the pursuers had disclosed the mode in which they fixed the average prices and carried over, and that the defender had never objected to the course followed by them.

The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling), held that the pursuers had carried through the transactions honestly as brokers without having any personal interest therein, and repelled (1) the defence founded on the system of averaging prices, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young holding that it was legitimate, Lord Moncreiff holding that it had been acquiesced in; and (2) the defence founded on the system of carrying over on the ground that the defender had acquiesced in it.

ON 19th August 1896 Thomas Clavering, Son, & Company, merchants and iron brokers, Glasgow, raised an action against John Alfred Hope, iron-merchant, Carlisle, carrying on business at Whitehaven under the firm of J. A. Hope & Company, of which firm he was the sole partner, and against whom arrestments had been used jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

No. 164.
June 16, 1897.
Clavering,
Son, & Co. v.
Hope.
2d Division.
Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

The summons concluded for payment of the sum of £551, 8s. 5d., as the balance of an account alleged by the pursuers to be due to them by the defender on a series of transactions in the Glasgow iron market between 26th August 1895 and 20th May 1896, in which they had acted as the defender's brokers.

The pursuers averred that in August 1895, and subsequently, they had "on the order and instructions of the defender, bought and sold various quantities of iron, and from time to time, on his instructions, carried over for him from one settlement day to another quantities of iron of which the defender was not prepared to take delivery and pay for. In the case of each transaction a contract-note was sent to the defender, and in the case of carrying over, a memorandum was sent to the defender stating the terms on which the carry over was effected. These contracts and memoranda and the course of dealing were the same as in the previous series of transactions, and the defender approved thereof, or at least throughout acquiesced therein, and he made no objection to the same or to the accounts which were regularly from time to time rendered by the pursuers to him until immediately before the raising of this action. . . . In many cases, in carrying over iron for the defender the pursuers, in accordance with the course of dealing between the parties and the custom of the Glasgow market, which was well known to the defender, contracted as principal with the defender, and in such cases they sent him proper and enforceable contract-notes, and these the defender in every case accepted without objection. . . ."

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The transactions in question having been carried out in accordance with the agreement between the parties and the custom of the Glasgow market, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (3) The said transactions having been carried out in accordance with a course of dealing and custom of trade well known to and acquiesced in by the defender, he is barred from challenging the same.

The defender in his answers averred;—"The relation between the parties in all the transactions was that of principal and agent, in which the defender, as principal, had, and was entitled, to rely on the pursuers as his brokers acting for him to the best of their ability. It was the business and duty of the pursuers as brokers for the defender to protect the defender's interest, to enter into contracts for him with third parties in the like position as himself for the precise amounts ordered by the defender to be bought or sold at the most favourable prices obtainable in the interest of the defender, and on call to disclose the

No. 164. names of these third parties and the precise contract prices in each transaction on behalf of the defender, so that the defender might sue such third parties if necessary. The defender relied on the pursuers' June 16, 1897. Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Hope. attention to this business and duty during his dealings with them. The pursuers, as the defender has now ascertained, failed in their said business and duty, and have without authority acted as principals in selling or buying to and from the defender. While pretending to act as brokers for defender they were, unknown to him, at the time dealing with the defender at rates fixed by themselves and in their own interest. The alleged custom of the Glasgow market is not known and not admitted. It is not, in any event, binding on the defender, and it is invalid and ineffectual to change the relation between the parties. . . . The defender believes and avers that the pursuers did not purchase for him the iron which they purported by their contract-notes to buy, and that in carrying over the contracts the pursuers in point of fact paid nothing, or at all events sums much smaller than those charged in the accounts."

The defender pleaded;—(4) The transactions covered by the account sued on not having been in fact entered into, or at all events not being such as the defender could have enforced against any third parties, the defender should be assoilzied. (5) The account sued on being overcharged, and not being a true account as between broker and principal according to the agreement between the parties, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (7) The alleged custom of the Glasgow market is invalid and ineffectual to change the relation between the parties, and is not in any event binding on the defender.

At a proof the following facts were established:—

In August 1895 the defender instructed the pursuers to purchase in the Glasgow iron market for himself 1000 tons of iron, and for a friend, Mr Eadon, 500 tons.

On 26th August the pursuers purchased 1000 tons from John Fullarton at 46s. 7d. per ton, and from James Dick 500 tons at 46s. 9½d., and allotted 500 of Fullarton's and 500 of Dick's to the defender, and 500 of Fullarton's to Eadon, in both cases at the price of 46s. 8d. as the average price.

The pursuers then sent to the defender (along with a letter stating the terms on which they would act for him *) the following advice-note. The words in italics were written, the others printed.

"This contract is made subject to the rules and usages of the Scotch Pig-Iron Trade Association.†

"We allow you a return commission of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent on this, and also upon all orders you may send from others, subject to our approval, and upon the same being properly carried out; that is to say, we charge for buying and selling 10s. per cent, returning you 2s. 6d. per cent—this however does not apply to the carrying over from month to month of the iron, but the c/o does not affect the above arrangement.

In making the purchases, the pursuers did not give up to the members of the Scotch Pig-iron Trade Association the names of their clients for whom they bought, and the sellers would not have taken them.*

On 25th September (the 26th being a holiday) the defender not having sent money to take up the warrants, it became necessary for the pursuers to carry over. They accordingly paid for the warrants, of which they then obtained delivery. They then filled up bought notes in their own name as purchasers from the defender, at the market price of the day 49s. 3d., and sold notes as sellers to him for delivery on 25th October at the price of 49s. 6d., the extra threepence being to cover store rent for the iron, interest, and trouble. The pursuers, at the same time, credited the defender with the difference between the price (46s. 8d.) they had paid for the warrants and the price (49s. 3d.) at which they bought from him.

At the same time the pursuers sent to the defender the following carry-over notes, along with the account given below:†—

It is not necessary to refer in detail to the other ten purchases subsequently made by the pursuers for the defender. They were carried through in substantially the same way. In some cases the name of the seller was mentioned, and in others it was not. In some cases where an average price was fixed, the separate prices of the different lots purchased were mentioned.*

The carrying over was in all cases carried out in precisely the same way as in the first case. In the correspondence between the parties during the course of the transactions various letters by the pursuers to the defender shewed that they were holding the iron for him, and that they had not obtained credit from the original sellers or advances from third parties upon the warrants to enable them to carry over.

William Wilson, iron-merchant and iron-broker, secretary to the Iron Trade Association, deponed,—“ . . . According to the rules and practice of the association, members of the association always contract with one another as principals, whether they are in fact dealing for themselves or whether they are dealing as brokers. . . . When a contract is entered into, the buyer comes under an obligation to take delivery of a certain quantity of iron on a certain day, and when that day arrives that quantity of iron must be taken delivery of in some way or other and the money found for it. When a broker receives from his client instructions to carry over his stocks, there

* In the advice-note sent to the defender on 4th September 1895 the price was stated to be 49s. 1½d., which was disclosed on the face of the note to be the average between 500 tons bought from Crawford & Company at 49s. 1½d. and 500 bought from Neilson Brothers at 49s. 2d.

On 6th September 1895 an advice-note sent to the defender intimated the purchase for him of 1000 tons at 50s. 4½d., and gave the sellers' names—Davis, 500 at 50s. 4½d; Herbertson, 500 at 50s. 5d.

On the same day another advice-note intimated the purchase of another 1000 tons at 50s. 9d., and gave the names of the sellers as Sanders & Company, 500 tons at 50s. 6d.; Crawford & Company at 51s.

At the same time the following letter was sent by the pursuers to the defender:—“ We received your wire this morning to buy 2500 Eadon and 2000 self, month, at best. The market opened excited with an eager throng of buyers, and it was exceedingly difficult to get on with business. . . .

“ We bought for you 500 tons at 50s. 4½d. and 500 at 50s. 5d. month, and for Mr Eadon 1000 at 50s. 4½d. and 500 at 50s. 5d. We could not manage more.

“ We wired you we were retaining and hoped to do better in the afternoon, at all events we will do our very best. Afternoon market opened very excited and irregular, and a perfect scramble for hematite.

“ We succeeded in buying for you 500 at 50s. 6d. and 500 at 51s. one month, and for Mr Eadon 500 at 50s. 6d. and 500 at 51s., and wired you. It opened at 50s. 1½d., 51s., 50s. 8½d. cash, and 50s. 4d., 50s. 3d., 50s. 6d., 51s. 3d., 51s. one month.”

are several ways in which the order may be fulfilled. The broker No. 164. may ask another member of the association on what terms he will take up 500 tons of iron and hold it for a month; or, as I do very often, he may pay for the iron himself and hold it for his client for the month. In that case the broker becomes the principal as with his own client. My invariable habit is to carry over in that way; I am never a broker in continuations. That method is quite common on the Exchange, but not invariable. If the client has a good and substantial broker to deal with, that method of carrying over is more beneficial to him than the other. . . . When a client asks me to have iron continued or carried over, I generally find the money for it either out of funds in my possession, if I happen to have as much, or my banker is behind me to advance me money to a certain extent against the warrant; and I send my client a carry-over note buying the iron from him at the settlement price of the day on which his lot is due, and reselling it at the higher price, the difference between the two prices representing the interest on the money value of the iron and the store rent chargeable for the month. . . . When iron is carried for a month, the usual rate per ton which is added to the price of the iron is one-eighth per cent, that is understood. The higher price consists of an addition for interest, rent, and a modicum of reward for labour. I generally add an equivalent to one-eighth per cent for labour. The amount of the interest and rent depends on the market rate for money at the time. I could not say that 3d. per ton would be invariably a fair charge; it might or it might not. Store rent is a fixed rate from year to year. A statement has been put before me which I was asked to check, and my attention was directed to the fact that an overhead addition of 3d. per ton per month had been made to the market price in September 1895, and in looking over my books I find that the charge of 3d. per ton was quite within what I would have considered to be then a fair charge. It would rather be less than one-eighth per cent, with interest and rent. . . ."

J. M. Clavering, junior partner of the pursuers' firm, deponed,—
 "We got a warrant from the selling broker in the transactions which we entered into for the defender. (Q.) Where is it? (A.) We acted as principals for him afterwards. We could not keep a specific warrant for him, but if he had paid his money he would have got the warrant. He could have got the warrant on three days' notice at any time for the amount of iron he bought. . . . (Q.) If he had given you three days, say about May, before the closure, would you not just have had to go into the market to buy? (A.) No; I would have given notice to the person who was lending me the money on the warrant, or if I had it in the bank I would have gone for it and got it, just as we are in the habit of doing. Any warrant would do as long as it was for the same quality of iron; the warrants are all the same. (Q.) Supposing you did not have a warrant which would meet one of these particular contracts, what would you do? (A.) We are bound to have it. (Q.) Could you not meet your obligations by just going into the market and buying? (A.) We could buy a warrant, but that is not the way it is done,—by us at anyrate. . . ."

The defender deponed,—
 ". . . It was a most improper method for the pursuers to adopt, to buy different quantities and to sell to me at the average price—a most unusual and unheard of thing to do. The contract-notes, Nos. 18 to 103 of process, which were sent to me, did not reveal that that was done, and there is not a word in the correspondence to shew that that is the practice. The injury done to me by the adoption of that method was, that if there was a shortage of warrants, I could not identify my iron, and could not insist on calling it up, and so get my backwardation; whereas the pursuers would have the warrants at their command, and could step in and take the backwardation themselves. The broker by that method takes from me all the advantages I possess from being a bull. When I am a bull, as I was in this account, I look to my profit not merely from the rise in the price of iron, but from the operation of the account from contingencies which may arise on a shortage of warrants. The bull makes his profits out of the 'squeeze' more largely than by the rise in the market. . . . The usual mode of carrying over is for the broker to sell to the person from whom he has purchased for his client, and then to re-purchase; or he may arrange with some third party on the market. The advantage of carrying over in the open market is, that it gives the client the chance of the backwardation; he can call the iron up in three days, and make the man who cannot deliver pay the backwardation. If the carry-over is conducted in the right way, by arrangement with the seller or somebody in the open market, then the broker never leaves his position as broker, and his only interest in the matter is to get his commission. If he is acting as a broker, watching his client's interest, and having no personal interest but that of getting his commission on the transaction, he would take the chance of making profit either by selling out or by backwardation, or in other ways, and it was for that very purpose that I kept the pursuers posted up with my address from hour to hour. It is all-important to the client that the broker should have no interest in the transaction beyond his commission. I expected that the pursuers would watch my interest and call up my warrants, and sell out or claim backwardation, as suited the state of the market. I never heard of such a practice as is alleged by the pursuers, of a broker buying his client's iron and then re-selling it to him. . . . I was never told in any way that they were buying my iron and selling it back again, until I saw it in the condescendence. . . ."

As regarded the form of the bought and sold carry-over notes, he deponed that he did not scrutinize them very carefully; that they did not convey to his mind the idea that the pursuers were buying the iron from him and selling it to him as principals; that he occasionally looked at the documents to see that the price stated accorded with that contained in the newspapers; that he was not aware that brokers on the Glasgow Exchange dealt with one another as principals in making purchases for clients. He also deponed that he did not notice at once that no brokerage commission was charged on the carry-overs, but that as soon as he did he wrote to the pursuers asking them to charge it.

On 16th February 1897 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, proof, and productions, repels the defences: Decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons."*

* "OPINION.—This is an action by a firm of iron brokers in Glasgow for the balance of an account said to be due to them by the defender on a series of speculative transactions in the Glasgow iron market, between 26th August 1895 and 20th May 1896. The employment is admitted by the defender, and the accuracy of the figures is not disputed. But the main

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—It was established that the pursuers, while professedly acting as his brokers, had during the whole series of transactions assumed the position of principals, thereby placing themselves in a position in which their interests and their duty conflicted.¹ (1) As regarded the original purchases.—It was a broker's duty to make contracts for his principal in his principal's name. Unless he did this he deprived his principal of the power of enforcing the contract with the seller. Rule 16 (b) of the Scotch Pig-Iron Trade Association (quoted supra, p. 947, note), shewed that this was the practice in the association. The broker must at least establish privity of contract between his principal and third parties in order that the former might have the rights of an undisclosed principal against the latter. The pursuers here had failed in their duty in these two respects. To take the first contract as an instance, the defender could not have compelled Dick, who sold to the pursuers 500 tons of iron at 46s. 9½d. to deliver to him 500 tons at 46s. 8d. The system of averaging the prices obtained from dealings in the market was outside the duty of a broker.² It was bad brokerage. (2) As regarded the carry-over contracts.—The pursuers did not deny that they had acted not as brokers but as principals. Instructions to carry over meant to carry over as defence is that the pursuers, while professing to act as the defender's brokers, committed a breach of their employment by contracting with him as principals.

"The parties were not strangers to each other in August 1895. They had had other transactions, extending over a period of years, for the purchase and sale of iron, from which the defender had derived considerable profit.

"The terms on which the business was to be done in this particular series of transactions are contained in the letter set out in cond. 1. It was contemplated that there should or might be a carrying over of the iron from month to month, but the precise mode of doing so was not prescribed, except that the return commission of 1/8th per cent payable by the pursuers was not to apply to it. An attempt was made by the defender to shew that the return commission was to be larger, but in face of the correspondence and the accounts rendered to him from time to time the attempt entirely failed.

"The first purchase of iron was made on 26th August 1895. It consisted of 1000 tons at 46s. 8d., deliverable in a month. The sellers were disclosed on the face of the advice-note sent to the defender—Fullarton for 500 tons, and Dick for 500 tons. Contracts are produced for these purchases, from which it appears that on the same day the pursuers bought 1000 tons from Fullarton at 46s. 7d., and 500 tons from Dick at 46s. 9½d. The extra 500 tons thus bought were allocated to Mr Eadon, whose order was forwarded by the defender along with his own, the whole truly forming one order, and the price charged against the defender was within a fraction of the proper average of the prices in the contracts with Fullarton and Dick. When the month was about to expire the pursuers, in default of instructions from the defender to take up the iron, had to carry it over, and it is as to their mode of doing so that the chief question arises. What they did was to pay out of their own pockets the price of the iron which the defender had bought, and to send him two advice-notes marked c/o (i.e.,

The ordinary method of arranging carry-overs for clients was for the broker, acting strictly as broker, to arrange that the purchase should be carried over by the original seller or by third parties in the market. This was important, for in the event of a sudden scarcity of iron, the defender had the power to call up the iron on three days' notice, and to get the "backwardation" in the event of the seller's failure to deliver; but if the pursuers were sellers to him as principals, they would have an interest not to advise him when to call up the iron, but to put the "backwardation" into their own pockets. It was not proved that the pursuers had always a warrant ready to meet their carry over), and dated 25th September 1895, one bearing that 1000 tons were bought from the defender by the pursuers at 49s. 3d. (which is admitted to have been the market price of the day) for immediate settlement, and the other bearing that the same quantity was sold to the defender by the pursuers at 49s. 6d. for settlement on 25th October. These c/o notes are Nos. 25 and 26 of process. The 3d. added to the price in the sold note represents the usual charge of one penny per ton for storage rent, together with interest on the money advanced by the pursuers to pay for the iron which they had bought for the defender on the 26th August.

"The transactions which followed were all more or less of the same nature. In the case of some, when iron was bought for the defender the advice-note sent to him did not contain the name of the seller, in others it did. In every case there was an actual purchase of iron in the market corresponding to the defender's order. Sometimes the iron so purchased corresponded exactly in quantity to the order, and no averaging of price was required. Of this the order of 29th August is an example (comp. No. 19 with Nos. 160 and 161 of process). Sometimes the averaging was disclosed on the face of the advice-note sent to the defender. Of this the order of 4th September is an example (comp. No. 21 with Nos. 163 and 164 of process). But the carrying over was always done in precisely the same way as on the first occasion, and the pursuers make no disguise of it on record that in the act of carrying over they contracted as principals with the defender.

"Before I consider whether this circumstance ought to forfeit the pursuers' whole right to remuneration (for to that extent is the defender's argument carried) I shall deal with the plea that the pursuers failed to establish privity of contract between the defender and the sellers of the iron.

"In so far as this plea is founded merely on the fact that the defender's name did not appear on the contract-notes with the sellers, it is plainly untenable. I know of no absolute and unvarying rule of law that in every kind of market, whatever be its custom, a broker must always from the first disclose the name of the principal for whom he buys. In this market it is the custom (and the defender must have known it perfectly well) for the obligations to the defender. They were in a fiduciary position; they had not fulfilled their trust, and the law would not inquire whether they had done injury, but would assume it.¹ It was said that the defender must have known and acquiesced in the course of dealing in connection with the carry-overs. There was nothing in the carry-over notes which, in respect of their acceptance without demur, could bring home to the defender a new contract based on different principles altogether. The absence of brokerage commission was not sufficient to establish such knowledge.² Much was made of expressions in the correspondence which it was argued must have brought home to the defender knowledge of the pursuers' mode of effecting the carry-overs. But he was entitled to assume that the pursuers were acting in the ordinary course as his brokers and not as principals, and he not unnaturally read the correspondence as containing nothing more than threats to exercise the broker's right to sell out his clients' goods in order to save himself from loss.

brokers to deal with one another as principals. There was always iron bought from third parties to meet the defender's orders, and the source from which it was to come was either mentioned in the advice-notes sent to him or it was entered in the pursuers' books. If he had desired to obtain the information with a view to taking up the iron (which he never did), he could have got it at any time. The occasion never arose for disclosing his name, but at the lowest he had, as against the sellers, all the rights of an undisclosed principal, and these would have been subject to no qualification except that the sellers would have had as against him all the rights and equities which they would have had as against the pursuers.

"A certain amount of colour is given to the argument by the fact that in a few cases the prices were averaged so that the price in the defender's advice-notes did not precisely correspond with the price at which any one seller had agreed to sell. Of course, if the defender ever required to proceed against the sellers, he must have done so at their price and not at his own. But this would have made either no difference in the result or so little as not to be worth considering. Thus in the defender's advice-note of 4th September the price was stated at 49s. 1½d., which was disclosed on the face of the note as being the average between one half of the quantity bought from Crawford & Co. at 49s. 1½d. and the other half bought from Neilson Brothers at 49s. 2d. That is an instance where there would have been no difference in the result. In the case of the first purchase on 26th August, to which I have already referred, the defender's accountant was at pains to shew that the average in the defender's advice-note ought to have been a fraction over 46s. 7½d. instead of being 46s. 8d., but he frankly admitted that the difference between these figures on 1000 tons would only have been about 10s., and that, I say, is a difference not worth considering. It is to be observed that the defender had ample notice that the system of averaging prices was being adopted in some cases, and this circumstance alone is sufficient to differentiate the case from Maffett v. Stewart, 14 R. 506, in which four Judges out of seven were of opinion, in point of fact, that a broker who had adopted an undisclosed system of averaging prices had failed to shew that any definite transaction had been entered into solely on the defender's behalf. Indeed, I do not read that case as containing any general doctrine at all.

"I now come to the question whether the pursuers' system of carrying

No. 164. Argued for the pursuers ;—The defender's whole case was based upon the sweeping averment that the pursuers, while professedly acting for him as brokers, had really been carrying on a private speculation with his funds. There was no proof whatever of this. The pursuers had, upon his instructions, purchased and paid for the iron ordered by him ; the purchases were appropriated in their books, and intimated each day to the defender ; the warrants for each lot of iron bought were always available to the defender if he chose to pay for the iron. They had from time to time carried over the purchases on his orders, and lastly, they had to sell the iron at less than its purchase price. The cases relied on by the defender had no application. They were illustrations of the rule that no one in a fiduciary position is entitled to place himself in a position where his duty and his interests conflict. Here the pursuers had no interest adverse to their duty. The only interest they had in the transactions was to secure their commission. In *Maffett's*¹ case (1) there was no purchase of stock to fulfil an order, the broker having already bought stock in a block ; (2) there was no appropriation, as here, of stock to any par-over is enough to vitiate their whole claim. The rule of law to which the defender here appeals is undoubtedly a salutary one, and I should be sorry to say anything to disparage it. It is that the usage of a particular market is of no avail against a principal who is ignorant of its existence, if it really changes the intrinsic character of the contract of agency into which he has entered. The most apposite illustration of the rule is the case of Robinson v. Mollett, 7 Eng. and Ir. App. Cas. 802. The circumstances there were, that a merchant in Liverpool instructed a tallow broker in London to buy certain quantities of tallow for him ; the broker did not buy the specified quantities from any person, but he proposed to allot these to his client out of larger quantities belonging to himself which he had bought both before and after the date of the order. On this tallow being tendered to the client, he at once rejected it. The House of Lords held that this system converted a broker employed to buy into a principal selling for himself, and thereby gave him an interest wholly opposed to his duty.

"The mere statement of the case shews how different are the circumstances with which we have here to deal. The pursuers from time to time had orders from the defender to buy 9000 tons of iron on his behalf, and they bought these quantities from third parties in terms of their employment. Again, they had orders to sell these quantities, and they sold them, with a resulting loss of £791, 13s. 4d. That loss would have been exactly the same whatever mode of carrying over had been adopted. The pursuers' mode had no doubt the effect of converting them for the time being into principals, but it gave them no interest opposed to their duty, because the only advantage which they gained from it was the uniform sum of 3d. per ton, representing storage rent and a moderate sum of interest on the money advanced.

"There was no element in it of the pursuers unloading their own property, or arbitrarily fixing a price for it ; the price was a market rate fixed each day by an official of the market. They certainly did not adopt the system from any desire to take advantage of a falling market at the defender's expense, for, on 25th September, when the first carry-over was made, prices had risen, and if the defender had sold out then, he would have retired from the field with a profit of about £120.

"There was another mode in which the process of carrying over might have been accomplished. The pursuers might have got the original sellers or other persons in the market to take up the iron, in which case they them-
